Unfortunately, the very similarity of new jobs to existing jobs makes it difficult—perhaps impossible—to determine how much the jobs programs fulfill the goal of creating new employment. The deteriorating finances of many cities and counties will now almost certainly compound this confusion. Squeezed simultaneously by inflation (which raised their costs) and recession (which lowers their anticipated revenues), many localities are already considering freeze or cutbacks. At least two major cities, New York and Cleveland, have announced significant layoffs. New York, facing at least a $430 million deficit in its $128 billion budget, has cut 7,900 jobs, or about 3% of the city's work force. And Cleveland plans to eliminate 1,100 of its 11,000 workers on Jan. 1.

In this situation, the first, natural, and most logical instinct of local officials is to hold onto existing jobs and workers. But here they collide head-on with government regulations (technically called "maintenance of effort" requirements) that are designed to insure that local officials don't play musical chairs with federal job programs. New York, for example, may be dismissing 7,900 workers, but it's also receiving a federal grant under CETA to hire 2,000 new workers. After a trip to Washington last week, city officials are still puzzling over the legal nuances that will determine how much of that money they can use to rehired the workers they've just fired.

Evaluating the PEP program, manpower specialists Sam Levitan and Robert Taggart concluded that subtle substitutions were widespread.

"At the outset, the level of PEP jobs represented net additions to the total number of public employment opportunities. However, this initial impact declined as the program continued. In planning their budget during the first years of the program, most (localities) were likely to consider the need already being filled by PEP participants. For instance, if a number of social service aides or teachers had been hired, the need to add regular employees for the same jobs had obviously declined."

The sickly state of the economy and local finances also exacerbates another inherent dilemma of a jobs program—whom to hire? Threatened joblessness for experienced government workers puts officials in a peculiar position. "We're not talking about the disadvantaged worker," says Anderson of the League of Cities, "we're talking about Mr. and Mrs. Middle American now. They've had solid attachment to the work force, a mortgage and kids in college." True as this may be, protecting these workers clashes with the widely-held notion that public service jobs should help those most in need of help.

Indeed, PEP faced the same choice and resolved it at the expense of genuinely "disadvantaged" workers.

As a result, perhaps only 17% of those only about one-quarter of the workers had less than a high school degree, against about one-half of all the unemployed. Concluded Levitan and Taggart: "The simple fact is that most (localities) wanted to hire the most educationally qualified..."

Though localities have benefited from PEP and its follow-on, CETA, they are dissatisfied. Many local officials feel abused by the on-again-off-again funding for the programs which causes constant planning problems. "It creates severe political problems," says Ralph Rosenfeld, director of the Mayor's Office of Manpower in Detroit. "We're the ones who have to hire and fire."

In short, PEP, though creating inevitable political pressures for permanent jobs programs, raised serious questions about how far a larger, permanent program could go in achieving the more ambitious goals of "public service" employment: reducing the unemployment and underemployment in poverty neighborhoods (where normal unemployment rates may average at least twice the national average). The usefulness of a jobs program depends both on the number of real new jobs it creates, and on the type of people who fill them—whether they are really hard-pressed, or people who have a good chance of finding a job anyway.

No less certain is the place of a jobs program in the government's arsenal of economic measures. Economists who believe that the nation is suffering from unnecessarily—and dangerously—high unemployment almost unanimously support a jobs program. Indeed, assuming that there's little initial "displacement," a jobs program should give the economy a slightly larger stimulus than any equal tax cut or increase in federal spending.

"With the economy sliding into deep recession, an expansion of public service employment is clearly highly desirable," Otto Eckstein, a member of President Johnson's Council of Economic Advisers, told the Congressional Committee on the Budget last week. "It is better to keep the unemployed working in public service jobs rather than to keep them in an unemployed status with its moral and skill losses."

Having said this, Eckstein also thinks that any public jobs program will not be big enough. "It's really a sop for doing very little. It's not going to be much bigger than $2 to $4 billion, and the economy needs a stimulus four to five times that. The economy has gotten so sick so fast that unless things are turned around, unemployment is going to 8% and might go even higher," Eckstein suggested at least a $15 billion tax cut; he believes that the inflation rate is slowly declining and will be about 7% at the end of 1975 whether or not the government acts to reduce unemployment.

Precisely the opposite view comes from economist Milton Friedman. He views the entire exercise of public service jobs as a giant economic shell game: If the government creates more public jobs, it will do so, ultimately, at the cost of destroying jobs elsewhere (either because the government spends less elsewhere, or borrows more money—which means that somebody else will be borrowing less) or at the cost of causing more inflation (because the Federal Reserve creates more money to finance new jobs).

Friedman regards with horror proposals like Eckstein's for more stimulus. He sees the nation locked in a vicious circle of self-destructive economic policy: Every time the government tries to halt inflation, there's a premature relaxation—in response to high unemployment rates—that leads to still higher inflation, which leads to another round of restrictive policies and premature relaxation. The vicious circle continues with increasingly high rates of both unemployment and inflation.

Friedman now foresees a temporary abatement of inflation (perhaps to 6 or 7%) next year, and then, with the economy reacting to excessive stimulus, a resumption of inflation rates as high as 15% by 1977. Friedman thinks that more joblessness will be the ultimate cost of public impatience with progress in curbing inflation, impatience he says is fanned by other economists.

What separates Friedman and Eckstein fundamentally is this question: Is a prolonged period of unemployment really necessary to bring down inflation, or isn't it? On the answer to that question lies the ultimate value of public service jobs as either nonsense or common sense.

WILLIAM TIMMONS AND GENE
AINSWORTH

HON. ROBERT L. F. SIKES

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 18, 1974

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, at the end of this month, two dedicated public servants will leave important positions in our Government to enter private business.

Bill Timmons and Gene Ainsworth, for the past few years, have been the direct link between the White House and Members of the Congress. Bill Timmons has been with the White House for 6 years after having served for 16 years on Capitol Hill. Gene Ainsworth went with the White House 2 years ago after 6 years on the Hill.

These two men served as important and dependable links between the executive and legislative branches of Government during some of the most trying times in our Nation's history.

These two men have served their country extraordinarily well. During the resignation upheaval and prior to it, they continued to be a stabilizing influence in the relations between the administration and Capitol Hill. They are outstanding examples of those public servants who insure that our Government can and will continue to function and that the American system of government still works.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

These two men performed their duties in an outstanding manner. They were always there when we called and they gave Members of Congress straight answers to complex questions. They were honest with us in their relationships and they never shirked the responsibility to deal openly and candidly with the Congress.

I personally am very sorry to see them leave their present positions. They have been invaluable to my office and to other congressional offices in the frequent contacts which are necessary.

These are strong and dependable men. I have enjoyed and I appreciate their friendship. I wish them and their families well in all their endeavors. They are truly among the unsung heroes in the ranks of public servants.

ADDITIONAL HISTORIC PROPERTIES (H.R. 17346)

HON. ALPHONZO BELL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 17346, which I have cosponsored, which would amend the Land and Water Conservation Fund Act of 1965.

Title 1 of this bill contains important provisions which I introduced in January of last year to increase the maximum eligibility of individual States for allocations under this fund.

In its present form, this legislation reflects what I believe is a fairer interpretation of the critical shortage of recreational facilities in areas of the United States where the most urgent need is felt—in heavily populated urban areas.

In California in the last decade, while population was increasing by 27 percent, attendance at State parks went up more than 56 percent.

The problem is even more severe with regard to national park units located in California.

Attendance at these sites in the last 10 years has increased by 96 percent.

There were 21 million more visitors to State and National park facilities in California last year than there were 10 years ago.

Today in California a ticketron computer system—much like those used in national parks—is needed for the reservation of State camping spaces.

Campers must now make reservations, during peak periods, as much as 90 days in advance of their vacation plans.

And last year alone, more than 237,000 camping families were turned away from State parks.

The shortage of parklands cannot be charged to any negligence on the part of California State government, or on California citizens.

In 1964, a $150 million State park bond issue was passed by the voters.

A similar $250 million bond issue for parks and park development was passed just last summer.

December 20, 1974

The State has sought and used every available Federal dollar for additional parkland acquisitions.

But with all of its efforts, including full use of available land and water conservation funds under the present formula, California is still able to fund only about one in five local government applications for park funds.

As population increases in our cities, the need for public recreational outlets increases significantly.

In California, the urban population, now constitutes 93 percent of the total population of the State.

This experience is not unique to California.

Population compression is producing vastly accelerated usage of public parks everywhere in the United States, and throughout the world.

The energy crisis and the higher costs of gasoline aggravate the problem, because they intensify the need to bring parks closer to the people where the cost of parklands is always much greater.

Mr. Speaker, what we do now—both in providing money for parklands across the Nation, and in providing for the best and fairest use of these funds—will have a permanent effect on our Nation.

We hear a great deal of talk about the deteriorating quality of life in America today.

This legislation gives us a chance to do something to improve the quality of American life.

GOVERNMENT REGULATION ON BUSINESS

HON. STEVEN D. SYMMS

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Speaker, I have received a remarkable letter from a friend in Idaho which I want to share with my colleagues. It expresses the sense of sheer frustration which most businessmen feel these days in trying to deal with Government rules and regulations. This Government has moved far astray of securing the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity. This Government, with the cooperation and apparent blessing of this Congress, has so severely constricted commerce and denied the rights and liberties of the individual that we are far down the road toward outright socialism. Until these collectivist ideas quit springing from the same rancid intellectual soil, we will have no peace and no freedom. I commend the following letter to my colleagues as a communication to this Congress which should be read with thoughtful reflection and a careful examination of each Member's conscience:

NAMPA CUSTOM CANNERY,
Nampa, Idaho, November 19, 1974.
STEVEN D. SYMMS,
Congressman, First District, Idaho, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR STEVE: I wish to thank you for your letter of September 24, 1974 and tell you that

December 20, 1974

I am having a continued harassment from the Department of Sanitation from the Southwest District Health Department with many of their ideas being completely irrelevant to the operation and with many situations being that the equipment which they desire to have installed will not perform through the years without excessive problems. The people in the food processing business, if we had reasonable inspections would be fine, but the people requesting things are completely out of line and creating problems for which excessive costs to be able to process the housewives food, will be required and I see no accomplishments or benefits from any of the points being requested. Besides that most of the processing plants in the area are no cleaner or better than the plant which we have been operating for over 20 years. If we had people who were reasonable and who knew processing problems, we would not have all of this trouble which the State Department seems to be wanting to stir up.

I have just returned from inspection and called upon about 10 plants in the State of Oregon, in the food processing business and they have regulations which are much more strict than anything in the State of Idaho and I have observed that the requests being given to me by our local state people are way beyond what any commercial operation in the State of Oregon is doing or in the State of Idaho. Now if they want to be that way, I do not have to operate the cannery. I have two other businesses which are taking my time and which are more profitable than the cannery, but I felt I had a local public obligation to my community having invested my money into this business to try to help people out, but evidently the thing is who do you give it to and who do you let suffer? I have been attempting to sell the cannery operation so that I can devote more of my time to my more profitable businesses, but I have not found anyone interested. So I guess the thing to do in this community is let the people of Idaho do without, let them starve, let them do it the hard way without a little facility and let these people, who are government employees, find something else to do because I am just through putting up with all this malarkey, that they seem to think is so essential but is nothing better than a miserable mish-mash of poor operating and poor performance standards.

I think all of these Government regulations are excellent for certain type of things but some of the Nit-Picking things that they seem to want to enforce are not worthy of any consideration and with this I am going to say that since they desire me to close in the City of Nampa and in Canyon County I am closing it as of the end of this year, because I see no future with a bunch of Nit-Pickers and this is all we have is a bunch of government Nit-Pickers. If they don't find one thing they will find something else and if they can't find something else they will just pick on something anyway. I don't need them and I don't want them, so I'm closing the cannery at the end of the season, unless I can get some satisfaction that these characters have some knowledge of what they are doing.

The only thing I have been able to learn with regards to the Inspector in our particular area, is that he has very little knowledge of the processing and that he has very little knowledge of how to handle things. Just because I am not buying him off, is why he is harassing me, so I'm just going to let it go and forget it, throw the $50,000.00. I have invested down the drain and say to hell with it and just let it set there and create a rat problem and a mouse problem and hope they have fun.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

You know I think that a lot of our congressional people in our federal lawmaking division think they are God given as you have stated, but they are not protecting the people from themselves or the greedy profit makers, they are handing things to the greedy profit makers by requiring some of these asinine requirements. Instead of keeping things simple and uncomplicated they are making things so complicated we can not live with them so the way we get rid of them is to make them go without and then when we do decide we can live with the situation we raise our prices 100% to the place if they want to use our facility it's what ever you want to charge.

There is one way I may be able to get around the situation. I could form the canning operation into a private organization only for members and unless you are a member for which you pay a fee you can do no canning. Membership of course being open to any one paying the fee. This way we would be like a private locker club and then we can tell the law enforcement people, I'm sorry this operation is run for the benefit of those who are members and you will have to take it up with the membership board. Maybe we can get around it this way and tell them to go to grass. But the way I see it what these people want is to take every greedy bit of any profit you can attempt to make and put it into the outsiders pocket for which they can get a cut out of and this seems to be the situation they are doing. These people are forcing the inflation so much higher by their requirements which do not fit or do they apply and if you can slow them down, for goodness sake let's slow them down, because we can not live with this continued inflation that we have created by all of these do-gooders running around the country. I know we have to have regulations because we do have people that are not attempting to provide quality, but the thing is let's have equal fair control. We can not control what the other people think, we have got too many people trying to do this for us and we are paying them a premium and forcing us to get our prices completely out of line with what the items being used are worth.

I just wish that we could return to the times when we were doing many of our things for less money. I look at it from the standpoint of price of labor, and price of hamburger. There is a direct relationship between what labor is getting per hour and the price of hamburger. We are getting no more value today than what we were in 1935 and we have no more today than we had then, because people were paying the same ratio of funds for food, housing and clothing in proportion to the wage as we are today. This is a fact of life but a lot of people don't want to acknowledge this factor so the thing to do is let people do without and let them come to the realization that they created their own situation by electing certain people to supposedly to do a job and they have not.

When we get these things all closed up and the rest of us all go on welfare which is what many people want us to do, then we can find out what it takes to do business because we have too much going to welfare and too much going to foreign aid and too much to frittering deals around the world. We need to correct this situation and I hope that you continue to work towards this end. I know that it is difficult and I know that we just have to keep working at it, but sometimes it gets to the place where we have to let people find out for themselves that this is not all a free gratitude situation.

Sincerely yours,
RAY L. DONLAP, Owner.

ALICE AT THE GLASS PALACE

HON. JOHN M. ASHBROOK

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 19, 1974

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, the United Nations is moving along in its own fashion. Its movements just bear little resemblance to the real world.

You ask what I am talking about. The answer is some recent history of the shenanigans at the glass palace on the Hudson River.

First, let us go back 3 years to the expulsion of the Republic of China. That country was expelled even though it had done nothing in violation of the U.N.'s Charter. In addition, the Republic of China had a larger population than half of the countries voting for its expulsion. But, as the argument went, the U.N. could not continue to ignore the existence of 700 million people in Red China while, I guess, it could begin to ignore the existence of the millions of people on Taiwan and their ranking in the top 20 trading nations of the world.

Many Americans who view the United Nations as the last great hope of man were somewhat upset at the expulsion of the Republic of China, but they rationalized this action as an aberration. Recent events though make one wonder.

Contrary to the U.N. Security Council, the General Assembly told the Republic of South Africa's representatives that they could no longer address the General Assembly or participate in its committees.

As U.S. Ambassador John Scall charged, the ouster of South Africa for its racial policies was in clear violation of the U.N. Charter. Only the Security Council can vote to expel a member and only on the grounds of nonadherence to the principles of the Charter. Expulsion of a member because of its internal policies—such as was done by the General Assembly—is prohibited.

Aside from the illegality of the move, the ouster reeks with hypocrisy. How can a nation like Uganda criticize any country when it openly practices tribal genocide? How can the delegates justify expelling South Africa yet retain a totalitarian state like the Soviet Union that has condemned millions of its citizens to slave labor camps and death? Almost none of the nations that voted to expel South Africa could pass the same test if applied to them.

The very next day the General Assembly managed to end the freedom of speech that used to exist in the Assembly. This was done by a ruling that no country's representative could speak more than once during debate. This came after a speech by a leader of the Palestine Liberation Organization—PLO—calling for the liquidation of Israel. This action by the General Assembly effectively barred Israel's spokesman from full participation in Assembly debate.

It is ironic that one day after expelling South Africa on supposedly moral grounds these same delegates greeted Yasir Arafat, a leader of the PLO, with wild jubilation. This man has played a major role in the death of so many innocent civilians. The PLO has bombed schools, hospitals, and public markets. Yet Arafat, wielding a pistol before the assembled delegates, is hailed as a conquering hero.

I am always amazed that the same liberals and leftists in this country who are so fast to criticize the United States find little to criticize in the United Nations. You heard little outcry from these people when General Amin of Uganda expelled Asians and massacred other African tribesmen. Nor has there ever been any major outcry against Soviet persecution of Christians and minorities even though such actions are inimical to the spirit and Charter of the United Nations.

The United Nations has expelled one country—the Republic of China—which broke none of the rules of the U.N. and tried to help other countries, has effectively denied South Africa its seat, because of dislike for that country's racial policies while ignoring similar policies of other countries such as Uganda, and has denied Israel its full rights to the floor.

Of course, the United Nations is not only concerning itself with other countries, but also the United States as I have previously pointed out. One committee of the U.N. has called for the independence of Puerto Rico from the United States, even though the people of Puerto Rico have rejected this alternative by their own votes in free and open elections.

Alice in Wonderland might understand the United Nations after her other adventures:

"I can't believe that!" said Alice. "Can't you?" the Queen said in a pitying tone. "Try again: draw a long breath, and shut your eyes." Alice laughed. "There's no use trying," she said: "one can't believe impossible things." "I daresay you haven't had much practice," said the Queen. "When I was your age, I always did it for half-an-hour a day. Why, sometimes I've believed as many as six impossible things before breakfast."

Perhaps it is past time that Americans should stop believing impossible things about the U.N., and recognize it for what it is—a body of small nations who with the help of the Soviet Union and Red China like to spit in the eye of the United States and other allied countries.

At this point I include in the RECORD an editorial from the Mansfield, Ohio, News-Journal:

THE DISUNITED NATIONS

South Africa will get along just fine without the United Nations.

In fact, it might even be better off since its expulsion from the world body. It will no longer have to be exposed to hostile haranguing for its policy of apartheid, which even if inexcusable is at least no worse than the actions of some of those countries which voted to take away its rights and privileges in the General Assembly.

And South Africa will save some $1 million annually in dues.

Eventually, however, the whole world will suffer if such occurrences continue in the UN.

First there was the dismissal of Taiwan to accommodate Communist China. Then came the ouster of South Africa, to the delight of the black African nations. Now there is even talk that Israel may not be seated next year.

The United Nations is becoming a propaganda playground for small Third World countries who now hold a firm majority in the General Assembly. The invitation extended to Arab terrorist Arafat was symptomatic of the situation.

Abba Eban, the eloquent former Israeli foreign minister, quipped recently, "In its present mood and structure, the United Nations would refuse to endorse the Ten Commandments on account of the Israelite origin."

The UN's role as a world peacekeeping body appears to be coming to an end. Instead of being, as intended, a forum for the peaceful resolution of world problems by all nations concerned, it is turning into a mutual admiration society, with a few countries like the United States permitted membership as long as they keep quiet and pay the bills.

SANTA'S LAST JOURNEY?

HON. STEVEN D. SYMMS

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Speaker, rumors are flying around Washington to the effect that this may have been Santa Claus' last year of operation. Sources within the Federal bureaucracy are privately indicating that the jolly old man is in big, big trouble.

Apparently, from the Federal Government's point of view, Santa has been "getting away with murder" for years now, "breaking every law in the book," as they put it. And indeed, the time has come to crack down on this unconscionable situation.

Here is the inside scoop on Santa's long list of infractions:

First. Operating a flyin sleigh in absence of certification by the CAB, a clear violation of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938.

Second. Unlawfully competing with the U.S. Postal Service on air mail deliveries.

Third. Violating EPA requirements for emissions control devices on his reindeer.

Fourth. Breaking the Sherman Antitrust Act by maintaining a strict monopoly in his profession.

Fifth. Violating the Fair Labor Standards Act by failing to pay his elves the minimum wage or proper overtime benefits.

Sixth. Engaging in unfair promotional advertising, designed to prey on the defenseless minds of children, a violation of Federal Trade Commission regulations.

Seventh. Failing to secure an ICC permit and an assignment of certified routes by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Eighth. Violating numerous Occupational Safety and Health Administration—OSHA—regulations by operating an "unsafe workplace."

Ninth. Passing out candy canes and goodies not approved by the Food and Drug Administration.

Tenth. Ignoring the edicts of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by failing to institute a quota system in his workshop based on race, religion, sex, and size—too many elves.

Eleventh. Making toys which were not approved by the Consumer Product Safety Commission.

Twelfth. Failing to declare the cookies and milk which are out for him as taxable income with the IRS.

Thirteenth. Transporting firearms across State lines as Christmas presents.

Fourteenth. Avoiding State and Federal taxes on his sleigh, not to mention licensing, registration, and having an operator's permit.

Fifteenth. Making various infractions of National Labor Relations Board regulations; including the maintenance of a nonunion shop and unfairly competing with the chimney sweeps' union.

Mr. Speaker, it is said that these are but a sampling of Santa's more serious Federal offenses, which taken in total, will almost certainly put the man in red out of business for good. At present, we are told St. Nick is frantically searching for a lawyer, but that no one as yet is even willing to come to his defense. Apparently it is an open, and shut case. Maybe the ACLU will come to his rescue!

Mr. Speaker, meanwhile, there is another Santa Claus of sorts in this country which operates the whole year 'round. It has served us all well for many, many years but is presently in the same predicament as Saint Nick, and as a result, is being pushed to the brink of extinction. It is called the American free enterprise system. Will anyone come to its defense?

CHEER THE LITTLE OLD LADIES

HON. ROBERT J. HUBER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, the public at large and the Congress reflecting this feeling, is beginning to express the view that the United Nations is not an organization helpful to the United States or even the cause of world peace. A recent column by Vic Gold that appeared in the Washington Star-News on December 17, 1974, pointed this out very well:

CHEER THE LITTLE OLD LADIES

(By Vic Gold)

The sweetest words you'll ever know are those that say, "I told you so!"

SAN FRANCISCO.—Here where the U.N. was born 30 years ago, let's hear it for the Little Old Ladies in Tennis Shoes who said it would never work. For the Right-Wing Kooks. The Folks Who Had to Be Pulled Kicking and Screaming into the 20th Century.

Think now, are there any liberal terms of ridicule from out of the past that I've forgotten? Oh, yes. Xeno-phobes, Super-Patriots and Flat-Worlders.

December 20, 1974

A cheer or some note of recognition is in order for these much-maligned people. They win the Winston Churchill Award for 1974. I call it that because Churchill was the prototype 20th century prophet who, though ridiculed at one time, proved to be right in his warnings about the deteriorating state of world affairs.

Last week, watching the U.S. ambassador serve notice to the U.N. General Assembly, there was no doubt that this year's recipients had to be those doomsayers among us who, back when it was considered slightly ridiculous by their more sophisticated neighbors, (1) wouldn't buy UNICEF cards and, worse yet, (2) slapped bumper stickers on their autos proclaiming, "Get the U.S. out of the U.N. and the U.N. out of the U.S."

Well, few if any of their neighbors are sneering now. The word is that in this season of General Assembly good cheer for Yasir Arafat, even UNICEF card sales are in deep trouble. And John Scall, then whom there was in former years no more sophisticated scoffer at Right-Wing Kooks, has taken to making speeches from the General Assembly rostrum which could have been lifted straight out of Barry Goldwater's 1964 catalogue of foreign policy lectures.

Scall warned his diplomatic colleagues last week that given the current irresponsible drift of General Assembly activities the American people aren't likely to continue to support the U.N. in the style to which its members have become accustomed since the Rockefeller family 30 years ago donated the land for the Tower of Babel on the East River.

Nor was that all that occurred in recent days to bear out the foreign policy clairvoyance of the Little Old Ladies. Following Scall's speech, no fewer than 71 U.S. Senators put on their tennis shoes, picked up the flag and petitioned President Ford to do something, drastic if necessary, that would curb the threat of "political and economic blackmail" by the now-prevailing U.N. majority.

Ford should tell the U.N., insisted the senators, that the General Assembly's "direct threats" to American foreign policy interests could mark "the beginning of the end" for the international organization which many of the petitioners used to call "the world's last, best hope for peace."

Nevertheless, despite the warnings of our U.N. ambassador and the Senate, those who now control the General Assembly have indicated that they intend to continue running roughshod over the interests of the United States and its allies.

Thus, it seems, the handwriting is on the Plaza wall, as clear in its stridency as those bumper stickers. And what was born here in San Francisco, out of this country's post-World War II euphoria, has long since died.

Face it, the Little Old Ladies were right all along; the sooner we ship the remains to Geneva, to be burned alongside the League of Nations, the better.

EXPERIMENTS AND RESEARCH WITH HUMANS: VALUES IN CONFLICT

HON. PAUL G. ROGERS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of this assembly that on February 18-19, 1975, the National Academy of Sciences will convene in its auditorium one of a series of public forums intended to illuminate controversial issues of national importance involving the uses of science.

The subject of this Academy forum is one of critical and urgent concern to all of us—"Experiments and Research with Humans: Values in Conflict." It constitutes a major effort on the part of the National Academy of Sciences to bring together the widest possible range of expertise to examine this important ethical problem, which is one of the most complex and far-reaching we have faced as a nation. Each day brings some new realization of the intricacy and magnitude of the problem.

I am attaching a schedule for the forum and call your attention to both the topics, and the speakers and discussants. They cover all the most important facets of the problem and include all of our leading experts on it. This is a crucial subject on which our committee has already acted in this Congress by establishing a National Commission for the Protection of Human Subjects of Biomedical and Behavioral Research (P.L. 93-348).

In closing, I would like to remind you that the charter of the National Academy of Sciences, which was passed by the U.S. Congress and signed by Abraham Lincoln in 1863, calls upon the Academy to serve as an official adviser to the Federal Government on any question of science or technology. It is my great pleasure to bring its forum on human experimentation to your attention.

The schedule follows:

FEBRUARY 18-19, 1975
EXPERIMENTS AND RESEARCH WITH HUMANS: VALUES IN CONFLICT

DAY 1

8:00-9:00 a.m., registration.
Welcome, Philip Handler.
9:15-12 noon, introduction, Frederick C. Robbins, chairman.

Perspectives of biomedical research
A Cultural and Historical View, Francis D. Moore.

The Benefits of Research, Lewis Thomas.
The Risks of Research, Walsh McDermott.

LOCAL CONTROL FOR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, two cities in the Sixth District of Texas, which I am privileged to represent, are trying to obtain local control of their public schools to form municipal school systems. The cities of Hutchins and Wilmer consider the lack of municipal systems an undue hardship on their citizens and recently the Dallas County Mayors and Councilmen's Organization resolved to support the efforts by the cities of Hutchins and Wilmer. I present that resolution to you.

The resolution follows:

RESOLUTION

Whereas, the Mayors and Councilmen's Organization of Dallas County was formed to give voice to suburban opinion; and

Whereas, twenty-three cities in Dallas County, representing in excess of 600,000 people, have chosen to join this organization; and

Whereas, the Mayors and Councilmen's Organization of Dallas County desires to present a united front before our county, state, and national governments; and

Whereas, two of our members, the Cities of Hutchins and Wilmer, are engaged in a struggle to acquire local control of their public free schools in order to form municipal school systems; and

Whereas, this organization recognizes the undue hardships the City of Dallas has placed upon these two cities by not considering their needs before acting on matters that would affect them both;

Whereas, it is a tenet of this organization that the voice of the electors in any given locality shall be heard and respected; now therefore

Be it resolved by the Mayors and Councilmen's Organization of Dallas County that this organization does hereby fully support the Cities of Hutchins and Wilmer in their quest for Municipal School Systems.

GEN. ANDREW J. GOODPASTER

HON. WM. J. RANDALL

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment today to call attention to some of the notable contributions to our country of a most distinguished American soldier, Gen. Andrew J. Goodpaster.

General Goodpaster retired this week from the Army after 35 years of active service in uniform. His active-duty career began when he graduated in 1939 as the No. 2 ranking man in his class. He saw combat during World War II as a battalion commander in Europe, where he was wounded twice and was awarded the Nation's second-highest decoration for valor in the face of the enemy, the Distinguished Service Cross. After the war he earned a Ph. D. from Princeton and served in key staff assignments. Most noteworthy, perhaps, was his work for 6 years as an Assistant to President Eisenhower. Later he commanded an infantry division and, among many other responsible jobs, he served as commandant of the National War College.

In 1968, he became Gen. Creighton Abrams' deputy in Vietnam. His experience and training prepared him well to take on his last great assignment—Supreme Allied Commander in Europe. He assumed that heavy responsibility from 1969 until relieved last week by Gen. Alexander Haig. In a position demanding statesmanship as well as generalship, General Goodpaster was at one and the same time a dedicated diplomat and a thoroughly professional soldier.

The lexicon of warfare lists just two tasks that are more difficult than waging a coalition war. First is forging a strong military alliance in time of peace. Second is keeping that alliance ready in a time of détente.

Those were the supreme challenges General Goodpaster faced and met in Europe over the last 5½ years.

The magnitude of his achievement compels our recognition. General Goodpaster knew that the greatest assurance of peace is to be thoroughly prepared for war. He increasingly labored to improve the balance and strength and readiness of the multinational forces under his command. Today, the military arm of NATO is a stronger and more credible force, due in large measure to General Goodpaster's determination and dedication. Free men everywhere are indebted to him.

As chairman of the subcommittee that had responsibility for reviewing our

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

NATO commitments in the last two Congresses, I can attest that General Goodpaster was candid and direct with the Congress.

I would go so far as to say we learned more in a few hours with General Goodpaster than in weeks of arduous questioning of Washington officials. I only wish our country had more men like him. I hope he and his family will enjoy a well-deserved retirement.

MR. HERMAN L. WILKES

HON. BO GINN

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. GINN. Mr. Speaker, the strength of our Nation is the character and strength of our people. All too often the individual stories of that character and strength go untold.

But on occasion a story is brought forward in a forum that brings it to the attention of many. I am proud that this has happened recently to a constituent and friend of mine, Mr. Herman L. Wilkes, of Brunswick, Ga.

I include an article about Mr. Wilkes published recently in Sport magazine in the Record at this point:

PAUL HEMPHILL'S AMERICA

He was born on a farm near a Georgia community named Siloam, just before World War II, under the worst of circumstances. His mother had married when she was 12 years old, that husband dying within their first year of marriage when he was kicked by a mule. She then married a handsome devil with a second-grade education who farmed his land all day, took a nap in the evening and worked all night in a mill. There were 14 children, and when the next-to-last turned out to be a boy, they thanked the Lord because now they had an extra hand to help out with the plowing and the feeding and the fence-mending. They named him Herman Wilkes.

By the time he was 14, Herman had quit school and was doing a man's work on his father's place. He even had his own mule and plow. From sunup to sundown he would hunker down to the backbreaking life of a farmer, suffering under the iron rule of his outrageously stern father, until the wisest of his sisters pulled him aside and told him the only way he would ever amount to anything would be to run away. So he simply walked away from his chores one afternoon, taking only the clothes he had on his back, and hitchhiked to a nearby town where a brother ran the meat department in a Piggly Wiggly supermarket.

Taking a room with board for $15 a month, Herman plodded along for a year or so as a stock boy and janitor at the market. Then one day the coach of the local high school football team happened by to do some shopping and, his heart jumping at the sight of this stocky young country boy, struck up a conversation. "I don't think I've ever seen you around before," the coach said.

"I don't go to school," said Herman. "How'd you like to play football?" Herman told him, "Well, if it means I got to go to school, I don't know."

The coach and the principal of the school worked on Herman and made it possible for him to enroll in the ninth grade. Herman lined up some weekend and nighttime jobs (pumping gas, sweeping offices, running a miniature-golf course), and in the fall of his 16th year, he entered high school.

On the first day of practice, they found Herman trying to step into his shoulder pads and had to show him how the straps go under the arms, not the crotch. But in a sense his football career began a few days later when he abruptly hitchhiked up to the furniture country of North Carolina to look for a job in a factory. Confused by football and school, understanding only hard work, he was surprised to learn that the only decent work you can find when you are 16 is on your father's farm or in your brother's meat market. It was a sobering, pivotal moment in his life. Going back to Swainsboro, Ga., he sought out the coach and told him, "I think I'd better go to school and play football."

Herman was the starting fullback on the "B" team his first year. During his sophomore year, as a 180-pound tackle in the single-wing offense, he made honorable mention All-State and was told by a University of Georgia coach that he could play for Georgia someday if he wanted to. That spring his coach, a fatherly sort who had taken a liking to Herman, called him aside and told him to drop all of those courses he was planning to take the next two years—woodworking, agriculture, physical education—and substitute for them algebra and chemistry and the like so he could "be prepared for college."

From that moment on, nothing but good things happened to Herman Wilkes. He became a full-fledged All-State player his last two years in high school, graduated in the upper half of his class and received football scholarship offers from 33 major colleges. Selecting Auburn, where he thought he might study to become a coach, he lettered for three years as the kickoff specialist and general handyman on some great Southeastern Conference teams. He was back in the pack, by no means a star (his greatest moment came when he kicked a 37-yard extra point), but he had come a long way from the farm in Siloam. He rejected an offer to try out as a kicker with the Dallas Cowboys, married a campus beauty and spent four years as a general's aide in Germany with the Army. After that, he coached high-school football for three years, got a master's degree in rehabilitation counseling, did probation work for the state and finally opened his own insurance agency in a town on the coast of Georgia.

Now 35 and the father of two boys (his wife died of cancer last year), Herman Wilkes has reached pinnacles he never knew existed. His agency earns for him around $40,000 a year. He does radio broadcasts of local high school football games, for no fee, merely because he enjoys it. He has coached midlevel football teams. He and his boys live comfortably in a subdivision home. A stocky, smiling man whose reddish face and country drawl hint at his background, he has made it.

"I quiver to think what would've happened if I hadn't run away that time, and if I hadn't discovered football," he was saying one day this fall, pressing to make it out to the stadium for that night's high-school game. "Of all those brothers and sisters, only myself and the sister who talked me into leaving hold jobs. One sister drank some Raid and killed herself, and almost everybody has suffered from bad nerves. I'm the only one to go past the ninth grade." He shook his head, as though he still didn't believe it. "They can say whatever they want to about football, but I can sum up what it meant to me in one word. Everything. I'm a lucky man."

HON. KEN GRAY

HON. CARL D. PERKINS

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 18, 1974

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, KEN GRAY has been my friend and neighbor for 20 years in Congress, and I regret very much his decision not to seek reelection this year.

He is a hard working, cooperative, and constructive Member of this House. It was my privilege to serve with him on the Committee on House Administration several years ago, and to know firsthand how he applied the sound principles he had learned as a businessman to the business of running the Congress.

KEN GRAY has not been a noisy Member of the House, but he has been an effective one. He knew how to get things done, and Members who have had public works projects in their districts and States have often found that KEN GRAY was a tremendously important ally to have on their side. All around the country, projects have taken form that would never have gotten off the ground.

It is a pleasure to salute KEN GRAY, but it is distinctly no joy to say goodbye—and we will not. I hope he remains nearby, and will be a frequent visitor to his old friends.

ASSEMBLYMAN CARLOS BEE

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege today to pay tribute to a fellow legislator from my home State of California and my district in Alameda County, the late Assemblyman Carlos Bee. I was honored to call him my friend. He was a valuable legislator for southern Alameda County and the State of California, and he will be greatly missed.

Carlos spent his life in service to others. As a teacher in Alameda County Schools, his wit and wisdom, as well as his interest in government, will long be remembered by his students. Even after being elected to the State Assembly, Carlos continued to return to Hayward School to teach classes during the recesses of the legislature.

Carlos came to politics naturally and his political career began with his election to the Hayward City Council in 1948. He was named mayor of Hayward in 1950 by his fellow councilmen. In 1954 he was elected to the California State Assembly to represent the 13th District. In January of 1959 Carlos won the post of speaker pro tem of the Assembly and continued to serve in that position throughout his legislative career. Because of his quick wit and leadership ability, he was able to obtain compromises in the assembly that would otherwise have been impossible. He won the respect of legislators from the entire State with his political successes.

One of Carlos Bee's greatest accomplishments and one which bears many remembrances of him is the California State University at Hayward. Introducing a bill to establish the university, first in 1954, as a freshman assemblyman, Carlos was dreaming for his constituents. He saw his dream fulfilled. Cal State at Hayward is now a flourishing university. The dormitory on campus, Carlos Bee Hall, commemorates his role in winning legislative sanction for the college.

His dedication to education, witnessed by his fight for a university in Alameda County, never faltered, and it can be said that he gave his life not only for his constituents, whom he served until his death, but for the education of all the children in the State of California.

It was an honor to have known this great man, and it is my hope that the respect and admiration which we all felt for Assemblyman Bee will be a comfort to his family. I hope his wife Jean and family can take consolation in knowing that the people of California share their loss.

THE POINT OF CURE

HON. STEVEN D. SYMMS

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Speaker, I commend the following article written by one of the greatest friends of Liberty to have lived in this century, Mr. Leonard Read of the Foundation of Economic Education, Irvington, N.Y.

Mr. Read is a very prolific author and throughout his prestigious career, he has been turning on the lights for freedom and responsibility.

Mr. Speaker, I commend this article to all those who would like to have a New Year's resolution which could lead each of us as individuals toward real progress which would be the expansion of human conscience through individual effort and individual self improvement:

THE POINT OF CURE

(In the history of man it has been very generally the case, that when evils have grown insufferable, they have touched the point of cure.—E. H. CHAPIN)

It is more apparent each day that the evils of runaway government—authoritarianism by whatever name—with its inevitable inflationary consequence, approach the insufferable stage. People by the millions are becoming concerned; in a word, they are waking up and are now wondering what to do about it. Good! As W. S. Gilbert wrote in The Mikado, "Don't let's be down hearted. There's a silver lining to every cloud." The silver lining in our dark cloud is this rising solicitude.

I admire Chapin's "touched the point of cure." For, regardless of any understanding that grows out of it, let us never get the notion that wonder by itself is all there is to it. This large-scale wonderment merely touches the point of cure and unless handled properly can easily prove abortive. The silver lining is indeed in our politico-economic cloud, but will we act intelligently enough ever to see it? That's the question.

The key to any success we may experience rests on proper treatment. The treatment I have seen thus far seems inappropriate; it is doing more harm than good, and turning sweet wonder into bitter skepticism and opposition. Unless there is an aboutface in tactics or methods, that silver lining is but an opportunity lost. True, the anxiety has touched the point of cure—no more; the problem is to find the role that each must play if our concern is to reach the level of understanding needed to effect a cure.

Here is the situation as I see it—in graphic form:

They way they now learn . . . The way they might learn . . . An awakening.

This chart symbolizes adult American society. The segment blocked in at the left represents the very few articulate, persuasive protagonists of socialism. The one at the right represents the small number of free market, private ownership, limited government spokesmen. These on the right are the devotees of the freedom way of life, who partially understand its imperatives and exemplify its essence. At least, most of us believe we do!

Between these two small polar groups are 130,000,000 adult Americans. While members of this segment may display expertise at a thousand and one specializations, they have few if any ideas—good or bad—when it comes to politico-economic affairs; they merely tend to follow one wing or the other—left or right. The wing they follow will get their votes and, thus, these millions render the final decision as to the political system under which the nation will live.

'Tis a puzzling picture! The millions rendering the final decision, yet which way they lean depends on the byplay between the few thousand in each of the opposing camps. The way the million go—the fate of the nation—is, in the final analysis, decided by how cleverly the small block at the left conspires to destroy a free society and how profoundly and wisely the block at the right strives to create such a societal ideal. The difference in tactics? Our ancestors would have phrased it, "As different as going to hell or ascending to Heaven."

During the last few decades, and up until now, the millions have leaned toward socialism. The reason as I see it? We of the freedom persuasion have, for the most part, employed unattractive—even repelling—tactics. The hope? That the new wonderment among the millions has touched the point of cure. Achieve the cure? Yes, provided we sufficiently improve our understanding and set our tactics straight!

Now for some analysis of ourselves—the block at the right. Opposed to socialism, yes. The remedy? Ever so many among us believe it lies in "selling the masses." This is just as far-fetched or unrealistic as selling the multitudes on becoming galactic explorers. Heightened consciousness—knowledge, wisdom, awareness, perception—cannot be sold. Like any other virtue, it is a personal acquisition, a quality sought for. I can no more insinuate an idea into your mind than you can ram a notion into mine. Each individual is in charge of his own doors of perception and he absorbs into his tissues only that which he wishes. If the selling tactic had no other defect than fruitless effort—spinning one's wheels—we could bemoan the fact and let it go at that. As I shall explain later, the "hard sell," as it might well be called, sends the ones who really count away from, not toward, the freedom way of life.

Reflect on the increasing number of people who insist on sending this book or that article to every member of Congress, or who write reams of advice to the President of the United States. In effect, straighten them out!

Not a responsive word is heard if "the sell" is from a stranger, one, whose counsel is not sought.

Such uninvited "wisdom" lands not in the minds of these governmental agents but in their wastebaskets. Further, the freedom way of life is thereby downgraded in the eyes of the besieged.

Add to these incorrect methods the increasing number who are throwing in the sponge, taking a posture exactly the opposite of what it should be. An example in the morning's mail, the concluding sentence to a despondent letter: "I am discouraged, I am angry. But worse, I am becoming apathetic." Comment appears unnecessary.

Before explaining what I believe to be the correct method, let me suggest why so many look upon this as a selling rather than a learning problem. We are market oriented—and selling is a prominent feature of the market. However, there is a marked distinction between goods and services which satisfy desires of the flesh and intellectual, moral, and spiritual ideas which are accomplishments of the intellect. These realms are different and we must employ the tactic appropriate to each. True, we can sell things to others but, so far as others are concerned, we can only learn ideas from them.

Over the years I have witnessed millions of dollars spent on advertisements presenting the case for freedom; much of it well written. Results? Nil! Why? People no more turn to advertising for intellectual enlightenment than to churches for auto advice or to entertainment media for religious counsel or to propagandizers for ideological perfection. For proof, merely reflect on how or where you turn for this or that.

Back to those in political office. Were one of them—the President or a Congressman—to seek your counsel, there would be a listening ear, that is, a wanting-to-knowness coupled with his acknowledgment of you as a fruitful source. If one wishes to be effective, here is a good rule to follow. Wait for the call—the seeking of counsel—but do everything within one's power to qualify for the call.

We must, however, analyze the kind of personal behavior which accounts for such calls. This above all: seek not agreement any more than praise; seek only righteousness, pursue only excellence. If this be one's major aim, and if a modicum of progress is made, some of those few among the Remnant—the ones who really count—will find you out. You couldn't hide your light under a bushel if you tried! Light mysteriously shines through, regardless!

The Remnant: In every society there are persons who have the intelligence to figure out the requirements of liberty and the character to walk in its ways. This is a scattered fellowship of individuals—mostly unknown to you or me—bound together by a love of ideas and a hunger to know the plain truth of things. These persons resist the hard sell, or any other kind of sell; they refuse to be fetched. Any suspicion that they might be the target of someone's efforts and they vanish. There is only one way to go about it: Let each cultivate his own garden—pursue excellence—and if he produces anything worthwhile, he may be sure, as Albert Jay Nock says, "that the Remnant will find him. He may rely on that with absolute assurance. They will find him without his doing anything about it; in fact, he tries to do anything about it, he is pretty sure to put them off. . . ."

In receiving the Parson's Award Governor Peterson in part discussed the role of the scientist in achieving a higher quality of life. The following are extracts from his remarks:

REMARKS OF GOV. RUSSELL W. PETERSON
Now, I would like to discuss the role of science—really, the role of the scientist—in achieving a higher quality of life.

Functionally, the scientist provides the basic data, information and advice, on which the public and the decision makers may act. While basic science, conducted for the sake of science, remains important, there is a growing need both for applied science and for

Why so much emphasis on the pursuit of excellence as the sole formula for the cure we seek? It stems from this observation: The higher grade the objective, the higher grade must the method be. If one's objective be the destruction of a free society, low-grade methods suffice. If, on the other hand, the objective be the creation of a free society, then this is as high grade in the politico-economic hierarchy of values as one can go; it correlates with understanding and wisdom and, by the same token, the method must be commensurately as high.

What is this method? It is as simple to state as it is difficult to achieve: arrive at that excellence in understanding and exposition that will cause others—those who care to know—to seek one's tutelage. Proof that this works? Merely reflect on those to whom you turn for tutelage in any field of endeavor. Obviously, only to those who, in your judgment, are more, not less, enlightened. For example, golfers at my Club do not seek my tutelage on how to play the game; they are aware of my incompetence. But wave a magic wand and make a Jack Nicklaus of me, and every member will sit at my feet, drink at my fountain, seek my tutelage. This is true in any field one wishes to examine, and in none is it more evident than in the rebirth of liberty—the goal of our ambition.

Yes, we have touched the point of cure. A brand new wonderment among 130,000,000 adult Americans awaits only an attracting excellence to effect the cure, namely, an about-face from democratic despotism to human liberty. We have ample demonstration that the "hard sell" does not work. So, let's try the learning and sharing process. As Nock said, "We may rely on that with absolute assurance."

GOVERNOR PETERSON RECEIVES PARSON'S AWARD FOR OUTSTANDING PUBLIC SERVICE

HON. CRAIG HOSMER
OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, the most prestigious honor awarded by the American Chemical Society for outstanding public service by one of its members is the Parson's Award. This year its winner was Gov. Russell W. Peterson, Chairman of the U.S. Council on Environmental Quality.

Dr. Peterson won his Ph. D. in chemistry and was long a scientist for the du Pont Co. Subsequently he achieved political success, first as Governor of Rhode Island and later as head of CEQ. He has so consistently carried forward his duties with excellence that AMC found in him a man to match the highest honor it bestows.

In receiving the Parson's Award Governor Peterson in part discussed the role of the scientist in achieving a higher quality of life. The following are extracts from his remarks:

REMARKS OF GOV. RUSSELL W. PETERSON
Now, I would like to discuss the role of science—really, the role of the scientist—in achieving a higher quality of life.

Functionally, the scientist provides the basic data, information and advice, on which the public and the decision makers may act. While basic science, conducted for the sake of science, remains important, there is a growing need both for applied science and for more effective and active communication between the scientist and the decision makers.

A scientist's views are of limited value unless they are brought to the attention of the top decision makers. This is a critical organization problem.

Nearly all decision makers are oriented toward the near term. They are besieged by a multitude of urgent problems. Tomorrow's problems can wait.

But the scientist's business is with tomorrow. And it's increasingly urgent that he get to see the boss today.

Furthermore, most decision makers are resistant to change. It is said that nothing is more certain than change except resistance to change. The scientist's business is change. With today's trends in the world leading toward catastrophe, the decision makers better get close to the practitioners of change.

Too frequently scientists report well down the organization line. Anyone along the line in a tight organization can block an idea. Only those ideas that suit the views of the most conservative person in the chain get through to the top.

Many of you in this room have worked with large organizations in industry and in government and know of what I speak.

Much has been written of late about how the scientific community might best get its input to the President. Now I have no inside dope about what the President may or may not do in this regard. I hope, however, that whatever he does he provides for direct, frequent consultation with his scientific adviser.

There are several other considerations which are basic to an effective role for science in achieving quality of life. The first is the need for a holistic, integrated approach.

Until recently, our perception of the quality of life, like our perception of the environment, and our efforts to achieve environmental quality have not been ecologically based; they have been fragmented. In a sense, our approach to environment has paralleled that of our approach to science in general. Throughout much of scientific history, there has been a thrust to reduce a complex whole to smaller, simpler, more comprehensible components. In the process, we have developed a greater and greater understanding of these components, but it is only relatively recently that we are recognizing that in the process we have failed to perceive the whole. Indeed, that we may have obscured our comprehension of the whole. That is why the holistic science of ecology is so critically important to our human welfare. And nowhere is its effective application more critically needed than in our present environmental endeavors.

As a chemist seeking to learn more about ecology, one of my first surprises was to learn how little we really know about the biosphere, and how great are the gaps in our ecological understanding. Subsequently, as I have become better acquainted with the field, I have come to better appreciate how incredibly complex an ecosystem really is, and, consequently, how difficult it is to obtain adequate ecological understanding.

There is much that a lone ecologist working in the field can contribute, in much the same way as a lone chemist working in his laboratory. But it is clear that the broader understanding we do critically need today can only be obtained through a truly interdisciplinary approach. Since the biosphere does not recognize political divisions and boundaries and since many of the impacts of our actions do not stop at national borders, our search for ecological understanding must be international as well as interdisciplinary. Decision makers are learning that we have to operate within the limits of ecological systems and constraints. But, of course, this does not mean stopping progress or going back to the cave, but rather it means understanding ecological systems and principles, and using this understanding to remove the limiting factors and enable us to move higher up the hierarchy of needs. It is my belief that developing this understanding, and developing the capability of conveying it to decision makers, provides one of the greatest challenges facing science today.

However, having emphasized the need for a holistic, interdisciplinary approach, and having noted some international progress, I must also emphasize that our traditional academic system is a powerful obstacle to achieving such an approach. Many universities have established interdisciplinary course departments, or curricula, but while the wrapping is different, the product frequently is not much changed.

Our problems of environmental quality and quality of life simply do not lend themselves to resolution via the old traditional fragmented academic route. Consequently, a major challenge to science is first, to develop the holistic training that is required, and second, and possibly more difficult, to adapt the academic system to handle it.

In conclusion, I would like to emphasize the following points: quality of life is determined by a person's success in progressively fulfilling a continuum of needs. Although most of the people on earth are still struggling for the basic necessities of life, many of us in the developed nations are now primarily motivated toward such things as self-fulfillment and self-actualization.

Our institutions need to continuously alter their activities so as to produce what is required to fulfill the changing needs of our people, and scientific knowledge and insight must be basic to that process.

There is a series of potential obstacles to achieving higher quality of life. As in any ecosystem, these obstacles are interrelated, and they constitute limiting factors, which, if unchanged, limit the improvement in quality of life.

We must learn to utilize, not fight, natural ecological systems; in effect, seek to live in equilibrium with them and use them to wisely expand the factors limiting increased quality of life. And we must develop an effective capability for ecological prediction, to provide for assessment of potential environmental impacts of our actions. Both these needs pose fundamental challenges to science.

Science has been a major factor in enabling mankind to reach its present status. However, to realize the progress we now recognize as necessary, there must be some fundamental changes. An integrated, holistic, interdisciplinary approach is required which must be applied with humanistic wisdom—not with the simple application of blind technology. To achieve this goal, basic changes must be made in our teaching of science and in our academic institutions themselves.

I am not an uncritical believer in the doctrine that "science will save us." However, I am convinced that science can respond to these new requirements, in the same way it has responded to challenges of the past; and that science can continue to provide the basic information, as well as some of the guidance we need, to achieve ever higher quality of life.

While I must admit that the problems before us do not exactly fill me with joy, I am optimistic that we will solve them. I have faith in the basic strength and goodness of this country and its people. We are a people who have met past challenges and I firmly believe that we are willing to sacrifice and work to solve our current problems.

It has been said, and I think with justification, that the United States is a Nation adrift—that it is in search of new goals to test its mettle.

Well, the challenges—population growth, food supply, health care, energy, environmental degradation and unemployment—are clear. We will either meet these challenges or become their victims.

This is no time for despair and pessimism. It is a time to renew our self-confidence—to pick goals that are realistic in this age and meaningful to people everywhere and then to challenge all of us to work hard, to innovate, to sacrifice to reach the goals.

And in working to reach these goals, we can obtain the self-fulfillment we all seek.

WALTER HARRISON "MR. RURAL ELECTRIFICATION"

HON. BO GINN

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. GINN. Mr. Speaker, the old saying, a man's actions speak louder than his words, is an appropriate description of a dear friend of mine, Walter Harrison of Millen, Jenkins County, Ga. This outstanding individual was recently honored at the Georgia Electric Membership Corp. annual banquet as "Mr. Rural Electrification."

It would take too much space to adequately describe the many contributions that Walter Harrison has made to his community, State, and Nation in his 75 years, but I want to take this opportunity to call to the attention of my colleagues some of the highlights thus far in his career of service.

Walter Harrison has lived in his hometown since his birth. He has been the editor of the Millen News for 25 years. He has served as mayor of Millen, as a member of the Georgia house and senate, has held every office in the Jenkins County Chamber of Commerce, and is a member of the Millen Rotary Club and the American Legion, Post No. 188. The list goes on and on.

His love of and dedication to God has been demonstrated many times. He is an active member of the Millen Methodist Church where he has been a member of the board of stewards and administrative board for more than 52 consecutive years.

He has passed on this love and dedication to the youth of the area by his work with the Boy Scouts, 4-H Club, Youth, Inc., and the Future Farmers of America.

Walter Harrison is a man who has known honor and recognition before. He is a great man in his own right, and a man who is known and respected by leaders throughout this Nation. But perhaps most significantly, Walter Harrison has always remembered his heritage and home town. He has added to the honor of our area immeasurably, and I count it an honor to call him my friend.

Perhaps his greatest contribution has come through his service toward improving the quality of life in rural Georgia and throughout the Nation. He is known as Mr. Rural Electrification in addition to being known for his decades of service that I have just mentioned. Serving his fellow man has been the hall-mark of his life and it has been through rural electrification that he has truly left his mark.

He has served in just about every position of responsibility possible in the local, State and national rural electric organizations. In addition to these many positions, he has worked diligently to improve rural telephone service and conserve the land.

Yes, Walter Harrison is a true public servant and a splendid friend to the citizens of Millen, the State of Georgia, and rural America. There is no way to fully measure the extent of his contributions, but millions of Americans live a fuller life because of his dedicated, knowledgeable, and unselfish service.

Never one to compromise his principles or beliefs, his life has been guided by Captain Parker's famous quote:

Stand your ground . . . Don't fire unless fired upon, but if they mean to have a war let it begin here.

Because Walter Harrison won far more battles than he lost, all of America is a better place to live and work.

MICHAEL FROME: ENVIRONMENTALIST

HON. KEN HECHLER

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. HECHLER of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the firing of Michael Frome, the noted environmental writer for Field & Stream magazine, by CBS is a sad chapter in recent history, reflecting hysteria against those who fight to protect planet Earth. Mike Frome is a straight shooter who staunchly defends the environment against the many forces working to exploit it. His dismissal is a classic example of how some people will cave in to political pressure from the big energy lobbies. Field & Stream has apparently decided to abandon straight reporting on the critical environmental crises which face us in imagine painting and puff pieces. In the process, we have lost a very able vote for conservation of our natural resources.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to include in the RECORD several articles concerning the firing of Mike Frome:

[From Time magazine, Nov. 4, 1974]

THIS SPORTING LIFE

Field and Stream (circ. 1,860,000), a monthly devoted to duck hunting, fishing and other woodsy pursuits, hardly seems like a cockpit of ideological controversy. Yet in recent weeks its owner, the Columbia Broadcasting System, has been the target of angry letters and calls from the environmental and conservation lobbies. Some of the protests came from members of Congress, including Henry Reuss, chairman of the House Subcommittee on Conservation and Natural Resources. Then 50 irate conservationists waved placards in front of CBS's Washington office. Cause of the wrath: the firing of Field & Stream's widely known conservation writer, Michael Frome.

Frome, 54, is a successful lecturer, magazine writer and author (Rand McNally National Park Guide), whose Stream columns have crusaded for preservation of wilderness areas since 1968.

This fall, Editor Jack Samson canceled the column, ostensibly because the magazine wanted a "modification in the editorial approach." Says he: "I've already hired someone else with an even more strident and stronger stand on conservation. I just don't think Mike Frome did a very good job." CBS officials say that they knew nothing of the change until Frome's supporters started to sound off, and that the parent company bore the writer no grudge.

Frome and some of his partisans insist that Stream's waters are murkier than that. Frome claims that after Samson was made editor in 1972, he was told not to "name names." Frome says that Samson, for example, refused to publish his criticism of John McGuire, chief of the Forest Service. Frome insists: "They want to play it safe and steady."

Irate Congressmen: Instead, Frome preferred to play it tough and tendentious. He criticized timber companies, highway builders and strip miners. Frequently he used his column to lobby against legislation that might be potentially destructive to the environment. One of his notable victories came in 1970, when he helped defeat a bill which would have given timber cutting priority over recreational and other uses for national forests.

Says Joseph Browder, director of the Environmental Policy Center in Washington: "Frome has raised the consciousness of millions of readers from bag limits and such to the real questions of what's happening to our resources and what can be done to protect them."

In the consciousness-raising process, Frome has made enemies in big business, the gun lobby and on Capitol Hill. Many Congressmen were irate about his controversial 1972 "Rate Your Candidate" article. The story evaluated Senate and Congressmen on their attitudes toward conservation and environment issues.

Says Congressman Reuss: "If Field & Stream has no place for Frome, then we have come to a time when the voice of conservation is, quite literally, a voice crying in the wilderness."

[From the Roanoke Times, Nov. 5, 1974]
FIRING OF CONSERVATIONIST WRITER IS DISPUTED
(By Bill Cochran)

Someone once asked Michael Frome, the widely-read crusading conservation columnist of Field & Stream Magazine: "Why don't you stick to hunting and fishing? Leave the politics to experts."

Replied Frome, "I wish I could. But without effective political action now, the hunting and fishing is apt to be mighty slim, or nonexistent, a generation hence."

Now Field & Stream apparently has asked Frome much the same question. Although not many of his faithful readers know it, since his column is in the November issue of the magazine, Frome has been fired.

Already, the wrath of this action is coming down on the magazine and its owner, the Columbia Broadcasting System. It's anyone's guess what will happen once the word really gets out.

Frome, a 54-year-old Virginian, has thrived on controversy, because he's not known to back down or soften his punches against those he views as a threat to conservation, be they road builders, strip miners, dam constructors, foresters, polluters, politicians or even the President of the United States.

From the nearly two-million circulation of Field & Stream, he gained his largest platform and rapidly grew to become a widely respected—and hated—conservation writer, at a time when similar magazines seldom informed readers of more than how to hook 'em and bag 'em.

Field & Stream lost some of its manhood when it fired Mike Frome.

Why the firing? Time Magazine—imagine this—devotes two columns to the matter in its current issue. It quotes Jack Samson, Field & Stream editor, as saying he wanted a "modification in the editorial approach."

Said Samson, "I just didn't think Mike Frome did a very good job."

But Time implies, and many must agree, that the matter runs deeper than this. Frome, in his consciousness-raising process, had made countless enemies, from big business to Capitol Hill.

He started his Field & Stream column in 1968, when Clare Conley was editor. Conley, a couple years ago, moved on when he felt the management, namely publisher Michael J. O'Neill, was looking too closely over his shoulder.

For Frome, being fired isn't exactly a new experience. When his writings got too rich for the American Forest Magazine, the mouthpiece of the American Forestry Association, he was fired from that publication, after a six year association as columnist. The issue, largely, was his opposition to clear cutting forestry practices.

As it turned out, this attempt to gag Frome did more to publicize his stand than anything else could have. It will be surprising if the same thing doesn't happen in the wake of the Field & Stream firing.

Shortly after his dismissal from the American Forest Magazine, Frome spoke at Dabney S. Lancaster College in Clifton Forge. Earlier, William E. Towell, executive vice president of the American Forestry Association, had stated that Frome's column was terminated, "only because he became personal and abusive."

Frome, a small, soft-spoken gentleman, stood before the Dabney Lancaster group and said, "Now I ask you, do I look like anybody personal and abusive?"

But like many good writers, he looked one way and wrote another. It is something that has gotten him into trouble, but a conservationist in trouble isn't exactly anything new.

[From the Vancouver (Wash.) Columbian, Nov. 7, 1974]
WHY WRITER MIKE FROME WAS FIRED
(By Jeff Stansbury and Edward Flattau)

Readers of Field & Stream know Mike Frome is one of the ablest conservationists who ever wore out a typewriter. He joined the magazine in 1968, served as its conservation editor for six years, waged a literate war on the despoilers of wild lands and brought Field & Stream rare distinction. Last month Frome was fired.

We asked the magazine's editor, Jack Samson, why he had let Frome go. "We don't wash our linen in public," he said. "It was strictly an editorial decision."

A dozen national environmental groups disagree. So do Reps. Guy Vander Jagt, R-Mich., John Dingell, D-Mich., and Henry Reuss, D-Wis. All have criticized Frome's firing. Most of them consider it a politically motivated act—and they have aimed their protest not only at Samson but at the communications conglomerate, CBS.

Field & Stream was bought by CBS shortly before it hired Frome. The network owns five other magazines, numerous radio and TV stations and nonmedia subsidiaries. It grosses $1.5 billion a year and for a long time scarcely seemed to notice Field & Stream. "We saw almost nothing of CBS in the early years," says Clare Conley, who preceded Samson as editor. Several developments in 1972 ended this benign neglect and sealed Frome's fate.

First, CBS brought in Michael O'Neill as the new publisher of Field & Stream. Then O'Neill fired Conley and replaced him with Samson. Finally, Frome wrote a "Rate Your Candidate" column that outraged the anti-conservationists in Congress.

O'Neill's credentials as an outdoorsman are elusive. He has sold ad space for Look and cooked up a gourmet magazine that fell flatter than a soufflé. Why CBS chose him to pilot an outdoor magazine is a mystery, except for the fact that he shares the network's dim view of hunting. He has told some Field & Stream staffers that hunting is on the way out. No doubt this explains why the magazine recently ran a two-page photograph of Phyllis Diller.

O'Neill's most notable act was his firing of Conley, who disliked the slickness that was creeping into the magazine. Conley had sponsored Frome's tough brand of journalism. Together they had exposed the abuse of America's forests by clear-cutters, stockmen, oil men and mining companies.

The new publisher was reportedly miffed by Frome's barbed writing. In 1972 Conley barely prevailed upon O'Neill to schedule the "Rate Your Candidate" column.

Frome's 1972 "Rate Your Candidate" column was indeed a blockbuster. It gave a few lawmakers perfect conservation scores but flunked many more. The column played a major role in the primary election defeat of House Interior Committee Chairman Wayne Aspinall, D-Colo., and it drew many howls of pain. Other legislators complained directly to CBS board chairman William S. Paley.

This tactic was effective because CBS must tirelessly woo congressional backing for its "equal time" and cable TV policies, license renewals and cross-media ownership. These concerns make CBS far more sensitive to the politician's wrath than an independent publisher of Field & Stream would be.

Thus, shortly after the 1972 congressional backlash reached CBS, Field & Stream began restricting Frome's access to his readers. Samson cut the length of his monthly columns and imposed political constraints on them. Last June he refused to print Frome's expose of shady land deals between New Mexico developers and the Bureau of Land Management. Samson also told Frome there would be no 1974 version of "Rate Your Candidate." Effective journalism, he explained, did not require the naming of names.

If Samson and O'Neill thought Frome would pull his punches, they were mistaken. A month ago Frome turned in a typically biting, well-researched critique of the Forest Service's latest public relations campaign. His curt dismissal by Samson came a few days later.

"Mike is one of the great voices of public interest writing," says Conley. "He'll bounce back because he's a fighter, but right now Field & Stream has stripped him of his readers." We thought we'd tell them why.

[From the Lander (Wyo.) High Country News, Nov. 8, 1974.]
(By Tom Bell)

It was a pleasant surprise to see Mike Frome gazing out of a page of Time magazine as big as life (Nov. 4, 1974). But then I read the article and that was not so pleasant. Mike had been sacked again, this time by Field & Stream magazine.

It seems that Mike's deft dissection of so many environmental problems, and his rapier-like pen used against so many politicians and bureaucrats alike involved so much blood-letting that it frightened the hierarchy of Field and Stream. In that cloistered world of egocentrics and egomaniacs called government, Mike Frome is too much of a threat. He likes to name names and lay too many facts openly before the public. And that threatens special interests.

Mike is gentlemanly charming, keeping his cool and manners even when confronting hostile adversaries. He is intelligent, witty, and knowledgeable. And he makes it a point to inform himself on the matters of which he writes. As a result, he is one of the most effective environmental writers of these pressing times.

When we were having problems in Wyoming, he came not once but several times to see and judge for himself. On one occasion he flew with me over the great Red Desert to see antelope and wild horses and the effects on them of fencing and mining activities. It also happened to be at a time when AT&T was putting in a transcontinental telephone cable—and unknowingly bulldozing out the historic Oregon Trail as a right-of-way. We flew on to see the valley of the Upper Green River and the threats to it of big dams. (The threats today may be more imminent than they were then.) And we ended in Jackson Hole where Mike addressed a group on the threats of clearcutting on the national forests to the famed elk herds of the area.

Along with Dave Brower, he generously lent his prestige to Wyoming's First Environmental Congress. And he just as generously gives of his time and interests to many other environmental efforts.

So it is that the hypocrisy of our system could never be better illustrated than in the case of Mike Frome. We tout our system as being one of freedom for the individual, and we particularly tout our freedom of speech and expression. His experience gives the lie to just how much freedom we really do have.

For years his lucid, penetrating columns appeared in American Forests magazine. But as the powerful special interests in the timber industry began to rape the national forests, his writings became more vehement against them. And he also turned his guns on the Forest Service, accusing it of being a willing accomplice. He was told that his columns must conform to "editorial policy." He refused and was told his columns would no longer be needed.

Now, it is Field and Stream's turn. When he signed on at Field and Stream as environmental editor, his writings were a refreshing change from the traditional "me & Joe" hunting and fishing tales. Mike, and sometimes fellow staffers Richard Starnes and Ted Trueblood, gave readers something more solid to consider than the mere taking or killing of nature's bounty. But, alas, if such mental sustenance was not too much for Field and Stream's readers, it was for the owners. Columbia Broadcasting System, and undoubtedly for many advertisers.

And so a powerful and compelling voice for urgent environmental matters has lost another forum. It would be different if Mike Frome preached destruction of the "system." But he does not—only the changes which are ultimately necessary if the system is not to destroy itself.

[From the Outdoor America (Izaak Walton League publication) December 1974]

MIKE FROME OUSTED BY FIELD AND STREAM

Mike Frome, out-spoken conservationist, author, and member of the IWLA, was released from his post as conservation editor for CBS-owned Field and Stream magazine in October. Frome was ostensibly discharged because the magazine wanted a change in its editorial approach. Field and Stream claims it will now take an even "stronger stand on conservation issues." But Frome insists that "they want to play it safe and steady" and that he was instructed not to "name names" in his hard-hitting comments.

Frome has long been a major asset to conservation, with his straightforward, no-holds-barred approach. He frequently used his column as a platform to denounce legislation which would be harmful to the environment. There are no sacred cows for Frome.

A great deal of controversy surrounded his "Rate Your Congressman" article which appeared in 1972. Senators and Congressmen were rated on their stands for or against conservation issues. Many feel Frome's greatest value is that he spoke effectively to people other than conservationists and he educated thousands who would not have been reached otherwise.

Frome's discharge caused a storm of criticism from the conservation community. A letter signed by all the major conservation groups, including the IWLA, was sent to William Paley, Chairman of the Board of CBS.

Frome, who keynoted the 1973 league convention in Duluth, says, "I have been flooded with warm and wonderful messages from all parts of this country, and indeed from other countries as well." One friend noted, "They couldn't stand the heat, so they kicked the stove out of the kitchen."

What does Frome think about his situation? "Personally," he said, "I'm looking forward rather than backward."

[From the Missoulian, Missoula (Mont.), Dec. 8, 1974]

FEDERAL MANAGEMENT OF LAND IS BLASTED
(By Don Schwennesen)

Conservation writer Mike Frome blasted federal administration land and resource management policy Saturday in Missoula, calling on citizen conservationists to mount a broad new environmental offensive.

"I consider (Agriculture Secretary Earl) Butz and (Interior Secretary Rogers) Morton two of the most dangerous men in America," Frome said in a keynote address before some 200 people attending the Montana Wilderness Association annual convention. "They don't tell us the facts—they've created a crisis of truth," he said, listing Forest Service Chief John McGuire as a close third to Morton and Butz.

COAL EXPORTS EYED

Picking up the energy-related coal strip-mining issue raised Friday by West Virginia Rep. Ken Hechler, Frome took note of continuing coal exports from West Virginia, contracts to export Alabama coal and recently revealed plans to export Montana coal—plans that were subsequently dropped.

"On the one hand they tell us we need this coal to sustain our style of living," he said, contrasting the energy crisis claims with a recent Business Week report that Alabama coal exports to Japan are contracted to increase from 60,000 to 10 million tons per year.

When administration and industry officials are confronted with facts on coal export, he said, they slide-step the energy crisis and claim the exports are needed to minimize an unfavorable foreign trade balance.

"We've got to get into the hard, gut issues and challenge growth at all levels," Frome told an audience that included regional conservationists, state legislators and Northern Region Forest Service officials.

LOCAL LEADERSHIP

"The leadership has got to come from out here" at the "grass roots level," he said, "where the resources are that the bankers on Wall Street want."

"If you can develop . . . hard line political policy . . . Wall Street isn't going to get them," he said, pointing to major environmental victories won at the polls last month.

"The politicians are coming with us increasingly," he said. "As far as I'm concerned, the fight to save our earth is just getting under way."

The former conservation editor of Field and Stream magazine also recounted events leading up to his firing, charging that a change in editorial management at the magazine had been followed by editorial censorship of columns he wrote exposing a Bureau of Land Management scandal in New Mexico and attacking the Forest Service's "Environmental Program for the Future."

LAND EXCHANGES

In the former case, Frome said, the BLM had worked out irregular land exchanges with the Crowder Investment Company, a private real estate firm, in which Crowder obtained title to over a half million acres of federal land—including valuable land near El Paso and between Albuquerque and Santa Fe.

But in a separate Missoulian interview, Frome blamed his firing on new and incompetent management at Field and Stream, and he discounted rumors that the targets of his columns had pressured the magazine's parent firm CBS, Inc., into giving him the axe.

Seemingly undaunted by the hassle with Field and Stream, Frome noted that he still writes columns and travel features for other magazines, commented on his latest book entitled "Battle for the Wilderness," revealed plans for new books he hopes to write and said that the "personal satisfaction outweighs the trouble by far" in the environmental battle.

FREE TO TALK

"Individually and collectively we can work miracles," he said and added, "don't have it on your conscience that you missed the opportunity."

"The core of the issue is growth, unrestricted and uncontrolled," he said. "Growth demands energy in ever-spiraling volumes. We have acted as though land, air, water, forests, coal, petroleum and metals were limitless."

"Now at last we must recognize the finite capacities not only for our country but for the world," Frome said, suggesting that future national needs must be filled more from present affluence and waste.

"If we want to be responsible conservationists, we must not endorse the policy of developing resources to the point of crisis," Frome said.

REMOVING SEX DISCRIMINATION FROM CERTAIN SECTIONS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CODE

HON. DONALD M. FRASER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce a bill H.R. 17670 that makes major improvements in the D.C. Code by eliminating certain features that discriminate on the basis of sex.

The bill is a product of a voluntary effort over many months by attorneys and others in Washington who are concerned about sex discrimination. The changes made by this bill remove sex-based criteria in several sections of the code but make no other policy changes.

Because the new City Council has authority to adopt this legislation, I do not propose to pursue this in the next Congress. Instead, I am sending copies to the new Council in the hope that they will give it consideration.

The following summary of the bill shows the logic of its provisions. I hope there will be broad support for this effort and early action.

The summary follows:

SUMMARY OF SECTIONS OF D.C. CODE CONTAINING SEX-DISCRIMINATORY PROVISIONS

§ 4-523(7) deals with the time spent in military service to be included in determining the aggregate period of service upon which an annuity for a member of the police department is based. The section refers repeatedly to the member's "spouse" as his "widow". Since women who serve in the police department may have served in the military and may have husbands entitled to annuities under § 4-531, the word "widow" where used in § 4-523(7) should be changed to "spouse".

§ 6-301 provides that the Director of Public Health shall send an acknowledgment of the report of a new baby's birth in the D.C. to the baby's father and if the father's address is unknown, to the mother. If the report does not contain the given name of the child, the parent is to return a form certifying the name of the child. Since either parent can perform this function, the law should provide that the report be sent to the child's parents or to either parent whose address is known, rather than giving preference to the father.

§ 15-502, dealing with property of a "head of household" which is exempt from creditors liens under § 15-501, provides that a mortgage, deed of trust, etc., upon such property is not binding unless signed by the wife of a debtor who is married and living with his wife.

The "head of household" is defined in § 15-501 as the person who is the principal provider for the family. The language of § 15-502 wrongly assumes that the husband always is the principal provider. The word "spouse" should be substituted for "wife" where used in said section.

§ 16-304(b)(2), paragraphs (C) and (D) require permission for adoption of a child only from the child's mother if the child was born out of wedlock, or if the child was born in wedlock but the child's illegitimacy has been established to the satisfaction of the Court.

These provisions should be eliminated. A father should not automatically lose the right to consent to the proposed adoption of his child because the child is illegitimate or born out of wedlock. (A further section of the present law, paragraph (d) provides that no consent is required from a parent who cannot be found or who has abandoned the child and failed to contribute support for six months. Thus, even if the law is changed as recommended herein, a father who abandons or fails to contribute to the support of his illegitimate child would be deprived of the right to consent to adoption, as would such a mother.)

§ 16-577 provides that the percent limitations on the amount of a debtor's wages which a creditor can attach do not apply when the judgment is being enforced for the payment of support or maintenance for a person's wife, former wife, or children.

Pursuant to the recommendations made with regard to §§ 16-911, 912, 913 and 916 infra the word "wife" should be changed to "spouse."

§ 16-911 dealing with alimony pendente lite provides that where the husband applies for divorce, the court can require him to pay maintenance for his wife and for her legal fees during the pendency of the divorce suit. § 16-912 provides that when divorce is granted to the wife, the court may decree her permanent alimony. § 16-913 provides that the court may grant alimony to the wife when divorce is granted on the husband's application. § 16-916 (a) and (b) allows the court to decree that the husband must pay reasonable sums periodically for the support of a wife or for a former wife, and minor children.

The above statutes do not allow the court to require the wife to pay alimony or support to her husband. Such an option should be within the court's discretion, depending upon individual circumstances and needs. (For example, Tibbs v. Tibbs, D.C. App. 1966, 223 A.2d 279, involved a situation where the wife earned more than the husband.) A statute is necessary to enable the court to award alimony or maintenance to a husband, since there is no basis for holding the wife liable under the common law, and other jurisdictions have enacted statutes for this purpose. See, for example, the annotation at 66 ALR 2d 880 et seq. "Husband's right to alimony, maintenance, suit money, or attorney's fees."

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

§ 16-2701, which provides a remedy for wrongful death, makes reference to a husband's right to recover for loss of consortium when his wife is injured by referring to a situation which would "if the person is a married woman, entitle her husband, either separately or by joining with the wife, to maintain an action and recover damages". The language should be changed by deleting references to "woman" and "husband" and substituting the word "spouse" where necessary, since women are also entitled to recover for loss of their husband's consortium. See Hitaffer v. Argonne Co., 1950, 87 U.S. App. D.C. 57, 183 F.2d 811, 23 A.L.R.2d 1368.

§ 18-102 provides that a male shall have the capacity to make a valid will at 21 and a female at 18. This statute should be amended so that the age of capacity is the same for males and females. That age should be 18, in conformity with national policy enabling persons aged 18 to vote in national and state elections and to perform military service.

§ 19-316 provides that illegitimate children shall inherit from their mother "in like manner as if born in lawful wedlock." There is no provision allowing them to inherit from their fathers, except that under § 19-318 a child born out of wedlock is capable of inheriting from his father if the father later marries the mother and acknowledges the child.

These statutes should be amended to provide that illegitimate children inherit from their fathers, as well as their mothers, in the same manner as if born in wedlock provided paternity has been established by legal process or acknowledged by the father. Cf. §§ 19-318 and 30-320 discussed elsewhere herein.

In addition, section 19-316 provides that the mother, but not the father, may inherit from the illegitimate child. A father whose paternity has been established by judicial process, or who marries the mother and acknowledges the child as prescribed in section 19-318, should be able to inherit from the illegitimate child.

§ 20-1908 entitles a female to demand and receive a bequest to her of personal property or money when she has arrived at the age of 18 or has married. Under the common law infants do not attain their majority until the age of 21. Jones v. Jones, 1934, 72 F.2d 829, 63 App. D.C. 373, 95 A.L.R. 352. If a statute lowers the age for females, it should also lower the age for males.

§ 20-2301 deals with appointment of a receiver for the property of one who has disappeared or absconded from the District of Columbia. The terms of the statute appear to be broad enough to apply to a man or woman who disappears. However, the statute twice mentions the wife of the absentee—as one without sufficient provision for support, and as one entitled to petition for appointment of a receiver—thus appearing to assume that only a man having property will disappear. The word "wife" should be changed to spouse.

§ 20-2310 is a related statute which provides that the property of the absentee may be applied to charges incurred in the support and maintenance of the absentee's "wife and minor children" and to the discharge of debts and claims for alimony proved against the absentee.

Although, as pointed out above under the discussion of § 16-911 et seq. a wife does not now have a duty under D.C. law to support her husband, nor is there a statute providing for alimony for a husband, there are situations where a husband needs support and the courts should be given the discretion to order it. This statute should be amended so as to allow an absentee wife's property to be used for her husband's support where necessary.

§ 21-102 provides that when one parent is dead, the other may by a will appoint the guardian of the person of the infant child, "other than a married female." The exception should be equally applicable to a married male child. A similar change should be made in 21-104 below.

§ 21-104 provides that natural or appointive guardianship of the person of a male ceases when he becomes 21 years of age, and of a female when she becomes 18 years old or marries. The age and circumstances for termination of guardianship should be the same, under the law, for males and females. That age should be, in conformity with national policy enabling persons aged 18 to vote in national and state elections and to perform military service.

§ 21-107 requires that preference for appointment by the Court of a guardian for the estate of an infant under 14 be given first to the infant's father, if he is living; or if he is dead, then to the mother, or if the infant is a married female, to her husband. This statute should be changed to provide that preference in appointment of a guardian should be given to the infant's father, or mother, or to the spouse of a married infant (As is presently the law, if none of the foregoing were suitable in the court's judgment, then the court could look elsewhere for a guardian).

§ 21-109 provides that when a female infant, for whom a guardian of her estate has been appointed, marries, she may select her husband as the guardian of her estate, with the approval of the court. This law should apply equally to both sexes. The statute should be revised so as to provide that when an infant, for whom a guardian of the infant's estate has been appointed, marries, the infant may select his or her spouse as guardian of the infant's estate.

§ 21-181 provides that the Probate Court may appoint guardians to indigent boys for the purpose of securing their enlistment in the naval or marine service of the United States, as provided by law, free of costs on account of the proceeding. § 21-182 states that the Register of Wills shall prepare papers in connection with appointment of such guardians, "without making a charge therefor."

The same opportunity for appointment free of cost should be available to indigent girls; and the law should be changed accordingly.

§ 30-111 requires that consent of a guardian to marry must be obtained for males under 21 and females under 18. The age to marry without a guardian should be the same for males and females. That age should be 18, in conformity with national policy enabling persons aged 18 to vote in national and state elections and to perform military service. This section also provides that the father shall be the guardian, or if there be no father, the mother. This language should be changed to allow either the father or mother to be the guardian.

Special attention in revising these laws should be given to § 30-211 which continues a husband's common law liability for a wife's necessities by providing that nothing in these laws shall be construed to relieve the husband from liability for the debts, contracts, or engagements which the wife may incur or enter into upon his credit or as his agent, or for necessities for herself or for his or their children. This statute retains the common law liability of the husband for necessities expended by the wife without extending similar liability to the wife. Both husband and wife should be equally liable as to the expenditures of the other.

§ 30-320 provides that the natural father of an illegitimate child shall have the duty to support such child until the age of 16, provided paternity has been established by judicial process or admitted directly under oath. The natural father should have as much duty to support an illegitimate child (when paternity has been established) as does the mother. Under § 16-916(c) the mother or father has a duty to support "minor" children. "Minor" is defined in §§ 16-2301 and 21-301 of the D.C. Code as being a person under the age of 21. § 30-320, by ending the father's duty to contribute to the support of his illegitimate child when the child reaches the age of 16, discriminates both against the mother and the child. The duties of mother and father toward their children should be equal.

§ 41-324(2)(e) provides that a partner's right in specific partnership property is not subject to dower, curtesy, or allowances to widows, heirs, or next of kin. This section does not refer to rights of "widowers". Widowers (who like widows are now entitled to dower under section 19-102) are also entitled to "allowances" and should therefore be mentioned. In addition, widowers should be mentioned because, in the case of persons whose spouses died prior to enactment of section 19-102, the "dower" interests acquired by widows was different than the "curtesy" interests acquired by widowers.

§ 47-2111 provides that no licensed employment agent shall send "any female as a servant or performer to enter any place of bad repute, house of ill fame or assignation house, or to any house or place of amusement kept for immoral purposes, or place resorted to for the purpose of prostitution or gambling house, the character of which such licensed person could have ascertained upon reasonable inquiry." There should not be a distinction as to the places where males and females can be sent for jobs. The word "female" should be changed to "person".

Most statutes use the words "he", "his", "him." Section 49-203 provides a general rule of construction for all laws in the D.C. Code that "Words importing the masculine gender shall be held to include all genders, except where such construction would be absurd or unreasonable." Such a provision is understandable for purposes of avoiding the constant use of "he or she", "him or her", "his or hers" throughout the Code. Some statutes, such as the provisions in Title 2 dealing with cosmetologists and architects, do use the phrase "he or she". However, there are some statutes in Title 2 which use the feminine rather than the masculine gender. These are: Sections 2-401 through 411, dealing with registered nurses, sections 2-421 through 440, dealing with practical nurses, and sections 2-451 through 469, dealing with physical therapists. Although each of the latter three statutes contain definition provisions stating that "she" and the derivatives thereof shall be construed to include "he" and the derivatives thereof (sections 2-411, 2-421(c), and 2-451(b)), it is evident that the statutes were framed on the assumption that the occupations of nurse and physical therapists are for females primarily and only incidentally for males. This is made apparent by the fact that Title 2 uses only the masculine gender in referring to those working in other medically related occupations of presumably higher status, such as dentists, psychologists, optometrists, pharmacists, podiatrists, or professional engineers.

Eliminating this statutory prejudice as to what sex should predominate in a given occupation could be done either by (a) changing all statutory references to "he or she", "his or hers", "him or her", or (b) changing the gender of the statutes dealing with nurses and physical therapists so that they are similar to all other statutes, and relying on either the general rule of construction in section 49-203 or the definitions in the particular statutes (revised to define "he"). Since virtually all statutes use the masculine format, it would appear that the easiest way to eliminate the appearance of statutory prejudice with regard to the sex of nurses and physical therapists is to adopt the second method of amendment.

STATEMENT ON THE VICE PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATION OF NELSON ROCKEFELLER

HON. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI

OF WISCONSIN

Thursday, December 19, 1974

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I look upon my vote on the Vice Presidential nomination of Mr. Nelson Rockefeller not in terms of a routine confirmation, but more in terms of a national election. Through me, as the Federal representative of the Fourth Congressional District of Wisconsin, my constituents are electing a nominee who will become the Vice President, and could become President. Therefore, my vote more than any other vote on a particular issue is a reflection of the views of my constituents.

On the basis of the unsolicited expressions of opinions of my constituents—my mail, telephone calls, meetings, visits to the district—since the announcement of Mr. Rockefeller as the Vice-Presidential nominee last August, a strong majority of the people of the Fourth Congressional District are in opposition to the confirmation of Nelson Rockefeller as their Vice President. This unsolicited expression comes not from a singular philosophical or political viewpoint but rather is reflective of the views of members of both major political parties and from the conservative and liberal factions of each party. This demonstration of a lack of confidence in Mr. Rockefeller is most serious since no national leader, however fine and decent, can effectively govern without the confidence of the American people who elected him to represent their interests.

This judgment is based on a number of factors which viewed individually do not necessarily justify a vote against confirmation, but viewed collectively, raise serious doubts of Mr. Rockefeller's capability of commanding the confidence of a sufficient number of American people if he were to succeed to the Presidency. These factors are:

First, Mr. Rockefeller's great personal and family wealth is viewed as a conflict of interest, or appearance of conflict of interest;

Second, Large gift-giving and significant loans—later to be forgiven—by Mr. Rockefeller to public officials are seriously questioned;

Third, The audit of Mr. Rockefeller's tax returns resulting in his payment of nearly $1 million in additional taxes is a most sensitive issue with the people;

Fourth, The lack of candor by Mr. Rockefeller about the derogatory book on Justice Arthur Goldberg financed by his brother Laurance Rockefeller at the time Justice Goldberg was running against Nelson Rockefeller for the governorship of New York was disturbing;

Fifth, A very serious question as to an individual of enormous wealth being able to adequately divorce himself from the corporation constituency and be totally immune from the monopolistic economic infrastructure of that system; and Sixth, The complete opposition to Mr. Rockefeller's nomination by the Right-to-Life constituents in my district based on his policy and past record on the issue of abortion.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against the confirmation of the nominee and thereby reflect the desire of the majority of my constituents.

JUSTICE IN MEXICO VI

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, Saturday, December 16 the Los Angeles Times concluded a six part series on what has happened to Americans arrested and incarcerated in Mexico, on charges of drug possession. As a member of the House Special Subcommittee on International Narcotics Traffic, I have a firm commitment to reducing the flow of narcotics throughout the world. Yet as the series of articles make clear, the issue is not drugs but justice for these Americans. Over and above the use and sale of drugs is the right to just legal proceedings, bodily protection in Mexican jails and open and speedy trials for these people. Beyond the question of guilt or innocence is the question as to the role of the U.S. Embassy in assisting and insuring that Americans in Mexico or any other foreign country receive fair treatment.

I have written Secretary Kissinger and asked that the Department of State institute an immediate and thorough investigation into this situation and come up with a corrective policy decision by Christmas. I have also been in touch with chairmen of the House committees appropriate to this matter. I would be very glad to share my files with the committees to aid further investigation.

Finally, I would like to take this opportunity to thank the Los Angeles Times. The courageous, well documented, timely and coordinated efforts of Jack Nelson, Paul Houston, Stanley Meisler, and Frank Del Olmo may well be the first step in insuring justice for hundreds of Americans. Their contribution deserves our thanks and appreciation.

I submit the article as follows:

[From the Los Angeles Times, Dec. 14, 1974]

GLUE-SNIFFING No. 1 MEXICAN DRUG PROBLEM

(By Stanley Meisler)

MEXICO CITY.—Mexico's internal drug problems are far different from those in the United States, where law enforcement agents have been trying with little success to stamp out the suppliers of heroin addicts.

According to Dr. Guido Belsasso, the director general of the Mexican Center for the Study of Drug Dependence, a government agency, the main drug problem of Mexico is the sniffing of glue, paint thinner and other solvents.

"For one peso (8 cents)," said Dr. Belsasso in an interview, "you can buy enough sniffer to last you a whole day."

The use of marijuana and the use of amphetamines and barbiturates are the next problem. "Way down the scale," Dr. Belsasso said, is the use of cocaine and substances like LSD that create hallucinations. "Even further down the scale," he said, is the use of heroin and other substances made from opium.

But although Mexicans rarely use heroin, they supply heroin to addicts in the United States.

Strict law enforcement in the United States has driven the price of heroin up to fantastic heights but has failed to prevent the spread of addiction. These prices have lured foreigners, like the Mexicans, into the business.

Mexicans grow opium poppies, mostly in the states of Sinaloa, Durango, Sonora, Nayarit and Chihuahua. The opium is then turned into heroin either at laboratories near the poppy fields or in the cities of Guadalajara and Culiacan.

On top of this, a good deal of heroin manufactured in Europe is smuggled into Mexico for shipment to the United States. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) has estimated that 60% of the heroin used in the United States is now produced or transhipped in Mexico. In addition, almost all the marijuana comes from Mexico.

The problem has been complicated by the evident involvement of local politicians, police and businessmen in the lucrative trade. Some U.S. officials say, in private, that the community leaders of Culiacan, the capital of Sinaloa, live off the proceeds from heroin. Added to this is the problem of the border. It is so long that American police agents cannot stop heroin from crossing. "We can't stop bodies from moving across the border," said a U.S. official. "How can we stop a kilo of heroin?"

For years, American drug enforcement officials have believed that the problem could be solved if the Mexican government moved with more energy against the source of the heroin. This feeling has generated continual U.S. pressures against Mexico.

In turn, these pressures—diplomatic notes and border crackdowns—have long irritated Mexican officials.

"Your government," said an important Mexican official recently, "is paying too much attention to the growing and not enough to distribution in the United States. If you dealt with the distribution you would have no problem."

Dr. Belsasso, who is a Harvard-educated psychiatrist, put similar sentiments this way: "When an American official says Mexico is not doing enough, my reply is: 'What are you doing to stop the demand in the United States?'"

"The key question for us to know is how can the United States reduce its market, this would in turn have a salutary effect, both in the United States and abroad."

Nevertheless, the Mexicans have accepted the need to help the United States fight heroin traffickers, partly because the pressure has been overwhelming.

In 1969, for example, the U.S. government instituted Operation Intercept and for 10 days its agents thoroughly checked persons and cars crossing the border for drugs. The interminable delays disrupted Mexican commerce and tourism and the Mexican government agreed to follow the American lead on drugs and to accept American equipment and training.

It would be wrong, however, to assume that the Mexican drug campaigns now are only a cynical response to U.S. pressure. Many Mexican officials have become persuaded that the campaign against drug traffickers helps Mexico as well as the United States.

"Our fear," said Dr. Belsasso, "is that we are being contaminated by your problem. Five years ago, the heroin problem in the border towns was nonexistent. A recent estimate shows that we now have about 1,000 heroin users just in Tijuana alone."

Dr. Belsasso explained that "some traffickers who cannot get all their heroin across the border sell it in Mexico. This contaminates Mexico by creating new addicts."

"My preventive priority," Dr. Belsasso went on, "is to prevent heroin spread."

Mexican officials also have become concerned lately over reports that the Mafia-like organizations that sell drugs to the United States are also importing sophisticated weapons from the United States. In shootouts with gangsters, Mexican officials say, police often find themselves out-gunned.

U.S. Treasury sources recently told the Associated Press that the Mexican government had pledged to intensify its campaign against drug traffickers if the Treasury Department would do the same against gun smugglers in the United States.

There is another reason for Mexican cooperation. The Mexican administration of President Luis Echeverria has been far more concerned with its international image than most previous administrations. Echeverria does not want Mexico to become known as a country that feeds heroin addiction in the United States.

U.S. officials often praise Mexican Atty. Gen. Pedro Ojeda Paullada, the official in charge of drug enforcement here, as a man who sincerely wants to stop the traffic. His cooperation is so great that he has allowed U.S. DEA agents to join Mexican federal agents in drug raids within Mexico.

Humberto Moreno, project coordinator of the DEA's Mexican program in Washington, told The Times recently that six of the 276 Mexican agents trained by the DEA had been killed in the line of duty. This statistic obviously reflects a commitment on the part of the Mexican government.

Other statistics do the same. From 1971 to November, 1974, according to Gen. Edmundo Arriaga Lopez, the chief of the federal judicial police, Mexico destroyed almost 6,000 acres of opium poppy fields and 8,500 acres of marijuana fields; seized 1,050 pounds of cocaine, 850 pounds of heroin, and 1,250 tons of marijuana; and arrested 8,729 Mexicans and 1,021 foreigners on narcotics charges.

Yet, despite all these statistics, the percentage of heroin reaching the United States from Mexico has increased steadily.

In a report issued in March, 1973, Reps. Morgan F. Murphy (D-Ill.) and Robert H. Steele (R-Conn.) concluded that, despite Mexican police efforts, "the smuggling of heroin and marijuana produced in Mexico continues unabated."

Atty. Gen. Paullada promises that Mexico will act even more effectively against heroin.

In an interview in the latest edition of Drug Enforcement, the DEA magazine, he said, "I am confident that the next campaign against the poppy (scheduled this month) will result in a decrease in the production of crude opium, a decrease in the amount that traffickers manage to obtain a sizable increase in the amount seized in Mexico, whether in the form of opium or heroin."

"So it is possible," he went on, "to anticipate with absolute certainty that less heroin will reach the American market from Mexico."

GASOLINE EXCISE TAX

HON. JAMES T. BROYHILL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. BROYHILL of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, recent reports seem to indicate that the administration is again considering the possibility of imposing a Federal excise tax on gasoline.

I am very much concerned that such a proposal would work a hardship on the many citizens of our country who are dependent upon their cars for transportation to and from work. This tax would only serve to worsen the inflationary burden on low- and middle-income families.

I do agree that there is a need for a national program of energy conservation. As a nation, we cannot continue our wasteful consumption of limited energy resources. It is vital that the Congress consider other alternatives to a gas tax for conserving gasoline. A gasoline tax is not the solution. It is a regressive tax. It will fall heaviest on those least able to pay.

Consider for a minute the impact of a gas tax on the price of food. The farmer would pay more for gas to plow his fields and harvest his crops, which in turn would require an increase in his prices to wholesalers. Wholesalers would have to increase their prices to retailers, in order to pay for the increased cost of getting the food to market. Ultimately, the consumer would bear the heaviest burden by paying higher prices at the supermarket. This same pattern can be applied to almost every other industry in our country, all with the same result: the consumer paying higher prices.

President Ford, in a speech on the economy to the Congress, firmly rejected the gas tax proposal. However, Cabinet officials and energy advisers continue to raise the idea of the excise tax. Several weeks ago, Secretary of the Interior Morton stated that the gasoline excise tax was a viable alternative in the plan to conserve energy. And yet, last week President Ford again publicly rejected this plan, stating that there would definitely not be a gas tax.

It would appear that this is a case of noncommunication between the President and his advisers. These conflicting statements merely confuse the public and threaten the credibility of the administration.

In advocating the gas tax as a fuel conservation measure, I do not believe the President's advisers have given sufficient consideration to the impact of such a tax on all segments of our economy.

The public needs to understand that such a proposal cannot be put into effect by Presidential action. Such a tax would have to be approved first by the House and then by the Senate. I personally see no groundswell of support for a gas tax in either House. I hope there will not be, because this is an inequitable tax, which penalizes those who live in areas without mass transportation. It penalizes those whose livelihood depends on the automobile. It penalizes those who can least afford to pay.

Certainly, I am aware that if the President should recommend such a proposal to the Congress it may gain support. I urge the President to lay this issue to rest once and for all and to firmly reject this proposal.

I would urge the President and his advisers to come up with a long-range energy program, and in particular, an energy conservation program. I am confident the President's advisers can suggest measures for conservation which will be more equitable than a gas tax and will not have the potential for fueling inflation, that I believe a gas tax would.

I urge the White House to submit these suggestions as soon as possible. I would urge the Congress to stand ready to consider and act on the President's proposals, as expeditiously as possible.

REFORM OF TARIFF ACT

HON. TOM STEED

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. STEED. Mr. Speaker, as a member and chairman of the Subcommittee on Treasury, Postal Service, and General Government of the Committee on Appropriations during the past 18 years, I have been particularly interested in the administration of our customs laws, many of which are relics of the horse and buggy days of international trade.

On September 10, the Honorable David R. Macdonald, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury—Enforcement, Operations, and Tariff Affairs—spoke before The American Importers Association stating "... customs laws and procedures are antiquated relics ..." and asked for suggestions for improvement.

The American Bar Association, under the leadership of a distinguished Oklahoman, President Jimmy Fellers, has taken on an increasing role in legislative reform. On December 13, the chairman of the Standing Committee on Customs Law of the American Bar Association, David Busby, responded to Mr. Macdonald in remarks to the Customs Lawyers Association, a distinguished group of Government lawyers in the Customs Service. Mr. Busby states that the American Bar Association wishes to help modernize the Tariff laws and suggests specific areas of needed reform.

I think this dialog is healthy. It presents an opportunity for cooperation and coordination between Government and industry, with the help of the American Bar Association, to effect long-overdue reforms in the public interest.

Following are the texts of the two speeches:

ADDRESSES BY THE HONORABLE DAVID R. MACDONALD, ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

IT'S HIGH NOON AT THE CUSTOMS CORRAL (OR HOW FAST CAN YOU DRAW BACK?)

It is both an honor and a pleasure to be with your Association today for my first major speech as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. I had a profitable exchange of views with your President, Mr. Katz, and Messrs. O'Brien, Gitkin, and Casey during their recent trip to Washington, and I look forward to similar exchanges in the future.

As a lawyer before joining the Government, I specialized principally in public offerings, private corporate financing, mergers and acquisitions, and other corporate legal problems. It probably is not obvious to you, therefore, why I was appointed Assistant Secretary in charge, among other things, of tariff affairs and of the 185-year old Customs Service. I can only say that having Customs, Secret Service, Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the Mint, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, not to speak of Foreign Assets Control and the Consolidated Federal Law Enforcement Training Center, George Shultz thought I would make a good utility infielder. When I took office, my income dropped in the same proportion as the size of my office increased—which Secretary Simon advised me was a fair exchange, considering that I was also being granted the privilege of working for the Treasury Department. Having been here for five months, I must say that I agree with him.

There is, however, one way in which my being unfamiliar with the Customs Service, its procedures and policies, may be helpful. The lack of any preconception regarding Customs operations brings into immediate and sharp relief those facets of the Customs Service which are unique. The sight of a missionary boiling in a pot may be old hat to the cannibals, but it will probably leave a sharp impression on first-time visiting missionaries. In the same way, those who deal daily with Customs may have become inured to its unique statutory procedures. To a newcomer like myself, however, the entire process, governed by a statute originally enacted in 1789 and revised only in piecemeal fashion since that time, resembles a scene from the Western frontier in the nineteenth century.

Perhaps the best way I can convey this is by way of metaphorical scenario—as you may know, we government employees are prone to talk in terms of scenarios—and that scenario, if I were writing it, would go as follows:

It's approaching high noon at the old Customs saloon. "Doc" Customs, the owner and general law-and-order man in the territory is lounging at the bar. Doc is a little ill-at-ease—rumors have been flying that Sam Importer, from the dreaded Importer gang, is in town and looking for trouble. A confrontation is at hand.

Common belief is that the Importer gang rustled some cattle from Doc Customs' corral last year, but no one knows exactly how much, because the Customs hands have such a large spread that it's difficult to keep track of the total herd.

In any event, a head of sweat breaks out on Doc's forehead as he tosses down his drink and starts checking his weapons. Doc has a lot of weapons, but he knows that Sam Importer laughs at the ineffectiveness of all of them except one—Doc's gun. This unique firearm is known as the Section .592 Magnum. It has the combined qualities of a gatling gun and a 10-pound smooth bore cannon. It's not too good at long distances but it's deadly at close range. The only problem with the Section .592 Magnum is that sometimes it's difficult to identify the victim afterwards.

As the sun approaches its zenith in the sky overhead, the townsfolk draw their shades and lock their doors—all except a small boy loitering near the swinging doors of the Customs saloon.

"Get away boy," murmurs Doc. "I've gotta have a clear line of fire in order to nail Sam Importer the second he comes through the swinging doors."

"Why don't you wait until he gets inside the room and then fire?" asks the kid innocently.

"You don't understand, boy," replies Doc. "If I don't blast Sam Importer just at the moment he comes through those swinging doors, I'll never get another chance."

The clock ticked on toward twelve. Doc's muscles tighten. His hand creeps toward his holster.

The whinnying of a horse outside breaks the silence. Doc realizes that this is it—only one man can be outside and that man is coming in.

The swinging double doors burst open—there, big as life is Sam Importer. "I've got an itchy trigger finger and I'm looking for the Doc," he roars.

The remainder of the scenario is strangely missing. Some people, mostly from the Importer gang, speculate that Doc emptied his .592 into Sam as he came through the door, only to find that Sam really did have an itch in his trigger finger which he wanted the Doc to treat with Cornhusker's Lotion for Men. Doc, according to this version, promised to remove the .592 bullets at his first opportunity.

Others, principally the hands on the Customs ranch, allowed that Sam Importer not only did not get shot, but that he made off with several bottles of unmetrified liquor before Doc could get his gun out of his holster.

Whichever way the story really came out, this allegory does have a moral. That moral is that the Customs laws and procedures are antiquated relics from another era—the era of the California gold rush, the three-masted square rigger, and the pony express. This is not to say that the ancient Customs practices have never produced anything worthwhile. Nathaniel Hawthorne was inspired to write The Scarlet Letter as a result of working as a Customs weigher and grader in Salem, Massachusetts. The experience of Chester Alan Arthur as Chief of the New York Customs Port undoubtedly stood him in good political stead when he later became President. Despite these intangible benefits, something has to be done in order to bring the Customs entry and clearance procedures out of the rigging and into the air-conditioned business offices of the twentieth century.

This is not to criticize the people at Customs who are involved in the process of clearing merchandise for entry. The fact that the process works as well as it does under existing primitive ground rules is a compliment both to the thousands of dedicated Customs officers and to the importers and customs brokers with whom they deal. It is conventional wisdom that the personal element is always able to botch up the most artfully and accurately designed program. The fact that the present Customs entry and clearance procedure works as well as it does, in my opinion, is proof that the reverse is also true—that people can make things work in spite of design deficiencies.

I am here today to discuss possible remedies for these design deficiencies, and to solicit your help in bringing them to fruition. The remedies presently contemplated are two-pronged. First, there is involved the controls over the physical entering of the goods. The incredibly complex entry procedures must be simplified without threatening the revenue or sacrificing the administration of the two hundred odd laws, in addition to the Tariff Act, that Customs must administer at ports-of-entry and along land and sea borders. Second, the legislatively mandated procedure for reporting, paying duties and enforcing duty payments must be brought into line with the automated practices presently utilized by most businesses. The modernization of the entry procedure, as many of you know, has already been commenced under the leadership of the present Commissioner of Customs, Mike Acree. Briefly, the streamlining of the entry procedure involves three main functional Customs areas: immediate delivery control, automated entry screening, and collection processing.

The immediate delivery control portion of the program involves the creation and maintenance of an automated inventory of all merchandise released under current Customs' bonding procedures. This procedure allows expeditious entry of the goods while tracking and reporting to Customs any subsequent failure to file the required entry documentation. It relieves the Customs import specialist of many clerical functions, permitting him to concentrate on more complex and difficult entries, thereby improving Customs' efficiency. The system provides the capability for prompt final action regarding entry transactions, which is accomplished by producing daily bulletin notices of liquidation rather than weekly postings that currently are experiencing a three-week delay. We believe that the daily bulletin notices of liquidation will give a more timely notification of trade community financial liability to Customs, in addition to removing the red tape that surrounds the physical movement of goods at the docks.

This system was inaugurated at Philadelphia, with the immediate delivery control successfully installed and operational since April 1974. Present plans are to implement the system in New York in 1976.

The automated entry screening procedures verify, and perform calculations on, data obtained from formal entries filed by customs brokers and importers. Many of the procedures of entry processing currently performed clerically will upon adoption of the system, be automatically performed. Duty computations will be made and merchandise subject to quota provisions or Internal Revenue taxes will be identified. Additionally, methods will be used to identify merchandise which, by past experience, may require extensive review by import specialist teams.

The collection processing subsystem, the third function, will automate the billing and cashier functions and establish an accountability for all collected funds.

Thus, under the proposed system, assuming that an appropriate bond is on file with his merchandise after Customs examination without the payment of duty, Customs will produce a monthly statement that will allow the importer to make one payment for transactions performed at various U.S. ports. Paperwork which presently prevents entries from being liquidated for four weeks or more will be completed in a matter of days.

Perhaps the most significant result of the program will be that importers will be able to deal with Customs as a single service instead of dealing separately with separate ports, with the concomitant variation in requirements and procedures.

From our standpoint at Treasury, we believe this system will remove many of the routine clerical tasks from our inspectors and import specialists and will, therefore, allow them greater time to perform their professional judgment functions. It will simplify Customs' relations with the many other government agencies that they serve. Almost an incidental result is the faster and more accurate management information which is generated in order to make better decisions for improved service. Of great importance to us, of course, is that Customs can develop this system within their current capabilities. It does not require massive reorganization or the appropriation of huge amounts of additional funds.

There are many details of this system which remain to be worked out. Customs must and will work with importers, brokers, bonding companies, common carriers and others. In this connection, I note that a general briefing between Customs and the AIA regarding this entire concept was held last month.

Just as important to the people in this room as the modernized physical entry procedures is a related legislative program which we presently contemplate proposing to Congress. The substantive details of this program have not been worked out, and will not be worked out without an opportunity for importers, brokers, freight forwarders and other interested parties to be heard. The essence of the program as now envisaged, however, would be the replacement of the entry-by-entry payment system with a procedure whereby Customs duties would be reported and paid on a periodic basis by those importers, and only those importers, who qualify for such treatment. In order to adopt this procedure without threatening the revenue, a statutory basis which enables Customs to audit the declared tax liability of the importer is necessary. Thus, the proposed legislation would require the maintenance of books and records by the importer relating to his business; would grant the Secretary of the Treasury or his delegate the right to audit those books; and would empower the Secretary or his delegate to require their production as well as the appearance of the importer himself for the purpose of giving testimony regarding his import activities.

I would like to emphasize here and now that any existing bookkeeping system maintained by an importer which is sufficient to reveal his financial condition and results of operations should also satisfy the proposed legislative requirement to maintain books and records. We have enough paper and forms in the Government now to satisfy the most discerning bureaucrat. No duplicate bookkeeping system should be required and, in fact, all those who presently pay income tax must meet similar legal requirements under the Internal Revenue laws. Our experience, however, has led us to conclude that existing civil enforcement powers are so truncated and that existing discovery procedures are so inadequate that the ability of Customs to find out the facts in an orderly manner is severely hampered. The result has been to turn the process into an adversary contest with, as you know, extremely high stakes. We anticipate creating effective methods of proceeding to collect the correct duty by the civil administration of the laws without resorting to procedures which are more nearly akin to criminal procedures.

At the same time, we propose, without endangering the revenue, to reduce the myriad of procedures and documentation required by filing repetitive entry documents and duty payments. As business practices become more and more technologically oriented, the retention of these green eye shade procedures becomes not only an anomaly, but also an unnecessary obstacle to further modernization. The Internal Revenue Service, along with countless private businesses, long ago recognized that benefits in terms of efficiency and economy, without weakening verification controls, could be obtained from a system of periodic account reporting. This system is equally suitable to the processing of repetitive, large-volume imports. However, without the recordkeeping and verification authority proposed in the legislation, any change from entry-by-entry reporting to a periodic return system would, in our view, endanger the revenue. In addition, the proposed alternative method of reporting and paying Customs duty would be entirely voluntary with the importer. We do not expect to require the importer to bypass the entry-by-entry method of importing unless he believes it to be advantageous to himself. In this way both we at Treasury and the importing community can experiment, with a view to ascertaining whether the new procedures will be beneficial to each of us.

Philosophically speaking, I do not personally believe that the proposed periodic reporting and payment concept can be successfully inaugurated unless the system of reporting is geared to existing business reporting methods of the importer. The success of the voluntary filing system of the Internal Revenue Service is in my view, based upon the fact that income tax reporting is built around an existing business bookkeeping and financial reporting system which is normally audited and utilized for shareholder reporting and internal management use. This is why we feel confident that we can assure you that no new bookkeeping requirements will be instituted. To do so would, in and of itself, defeat the system. In fact, the ultimate purpose of the new system would be to work toward a single set of records which businessmen can maintain that will be adequate for all governmental reporting and taxpaying functions. You should be aware that transactions between related importers and exporters as reported to Customs will be examined on an integral basis with the same transactions as reported, for example, to the Internal Revenue Service.

The question may have occurred to you by now whether the penalty provisions of Section 592 would be retained for those imports brought in under the new procedures. I can only say at this time that we would listen to any suggestion that would result in more sophisticated enforcement procedures which are equally effective in protecting the revenue. I underline that condition.

Speaking of Section 592, I should mention that we intend to publish major portions of the Treasury guidelines governing mitigation procedures in the relatively near future. At the same time, while we are always willing to listen to suggestions for procedural improvements, I would not anticipate any change in the manner of use of Section 592 beyond those changes which were suggested by the AIA and others and were subsequently adopted by Treasury. Until adequate medical help is available, the in terrore effect of exercising duty violations by Customs with doctors will have to remain in place.

We also look forward to seeing your representatives in Washington. We at Treasury and Customs desire to work with you who are closely involved in the importing process to improve that process. Having worked in what I now call the "private sector" for many years, I am well aware that a continuing dialog must be maintained between industry and government in order to promote a clearer perspective of importing activities by Customs and of Customs' activities by the importing community.

I have only one recommendation to make regarding your visit. Don't come in with an itchy trigger finger—just belly up to the bar and the verbal libations will be on the house! Thank you.

REMARKS BY DAVID BUSBY AT LUNCHEON MEETING OF THE CUSTOMS LAWYERS ASSOCIATION, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1974

IT'S HIGH NOON AT THE CUSTOMS CORRAL (OR CONSTRUCTION NOT CONFRONTATION)

Recently the Honorable David R. Macdonald, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, fascinated customs lawyers with a speech he made to the American Importers Association in New York. He conjured up a scenario about high noon at the old customs saloon in which "Doc" Customs stood waiting at the bar to blast "Sam Importer" just at the moment he came through the swinging doors. Mr. Macdonald then speculated as to what happened next—

Whether Doc emptied his Magnum into Sam as he came through the door;

Whether Sam really only had an itchy finger which he wanted Doc to treat with Corn Huskers Lotion; or Whether Sam got away unscathed with several bottles of liquor before Doc could get his gun out of his holster.

Secretary Macdonald then states the moral: "... that the Customs laws and procedures are antiquated relics from another era, the era of the California gold rush, the three-masted square rigger, and the pony express ... something has to be done in order to bring the Customs entry and clearance procedures out of the rigging and into the air-conditioned business offices of the twentieth century."

Almost unnoticed in this colorful metaphor was the following—and I quote:

"As the sun approaches its zenith in the sky overhead, the townsfolk draw their shades and lock their doors—all except a small boy loitering near the swinging doors of the Customs saloon."

"Get away boy," murmurs Doc. "I've gotta have a clear line of fire in order to nail Sam Importer the second he comes through the swinging doors."

"Why don't you wait until he gets inside the room and then fire?" asks the kid innocently.

"You don't understand, boy," replies Doc. "If I don't blast Sam Importer just at the moment he comes through those swinging doors, I'll never get another chance."

With some trepidation, I will now presume to complete Mr. Macdonald's scenario as follows: As the clock ticks on toward 12 noon the young fellow asks Doc to sit down with Sam and try to work things out. Over a glass of sarsaparilla they talk about how well Maw IRIS has done with her honor system, collecting her rents quarterly from the townsfolk. Finally they agree on the Rules of the Range and even set up a charge account for Sam at the saloon on condition that Sam will put his magnum up for security.

The question I would like to discuss today is—who is that young fellow who asked such a basic and reasonable question and who gets Sam and Doc to agree on new rules? Who stands between Sam Importer and Doc Customs, between the fearsome power of the Multinational Corporations and that of the U.S. Government—usually in the direct line of fire? Perhaps Mr. Macdonald was referring to himself. But I suspect that as a lawyer, he was referring to the legal profession, the customs lawyers—both in and out of government—who so often find themselves in the middle of the shootout and who seek to conciliate between the sometimes almost paranoid suspicions each side has of the other. Who besides a lawyer would ask such a simple question which is at the same time precisely relevant and yet irreverent in that it challenges the basic assumption that has grown up around customs law and practice since that historic day the first Customs Act was passed on the Fourth of July 1789?

That basic assumption was—and in large part continues to be—that Sam Importer is a fly-by-night character, not to be trusted. Probably the genesis of this was the first Congress' concern over the cotton-rum-slave traders of that era. A reading of the report of that debate of April 20, 1789 makes clear the Congress' distrust of the slave traders.

The reason this attitude has persisted is in large part the real and vital concern Customs has had with the entry of individuals—many of whom really do smuggle in goods, which, if not discovered upon entry cannot thereafter be dealt with according to law. This has diverted the attention of all of us from the reform of laws affecting the commercial importation of goods—now far outweighing and overshadowing personal entry.

Another reason customs reform has been so long neglected is that customs lawyers have not fulfilled their public responsibility to speak out. Perhaps—to continue the metaphor—they have been too busy dodging bullets or even, as some would suggest, watching the cash register. But I would suggest that a principal reason for their failure to speak out is that they have no voice—at least no coordinated voice.

The customs bar has been split into various elements, some of which are your Customs Lawyers Association; the Association of the Customs Bar; and the various American Bar Association groups—subcommittees of the Administrative Law Section, the International Law Section, the Tax Law Section, the Antitrust Section—and, finally, the seven man ABA Standing Committee on Customs Law, on which your Leonard Lehman so ably serves and which I chair. This Committee has recently committed itself to sponsor a dialogue among customs lawyers' groups to promote a professional cohesiveness among customs lawyers.

Commissioner Acree was the first to point out the present fragmentation in a talk to the customs lawyers at the First Judicial Conference of the U.S. Court of Customs and Patent Appeals last May. He noted that in his experience with the Internal Revenue Service there was a rather well defined and active group of lawyers in and out of government comprising the "tax bar." He felt that the interests of both the government and the taxpayer were well served by the open channels of communications existing in the tax bar and that he hoped the same could be accomplished under the auspices of the American Bar Association in the field of customs law. Needless to say, I agree with him, and I am here today to urge you to help our Committee to provide a forum for customs lawyers to exercise their right and to assume their duty to speak out. If the customs laws and procedures need to be overhauled, who can do it better than the men in this room—lawyers whose whole professional lives are devoted to the Customs Service.

Lawyers are taught to ask the simple basic question and to challenge the premises, to define workable, sensible, and fair rules. Our time in law school will have been wasted if we spend our professional lives merely putting each problem into its proper slot and cranking out the answer. We should, and must, render a higher service to the public.

Furthermore, this really is High Noon at the Customs Corral. We may never again have a moment in history that lends itself so well to the reconstruction of the customs law. Today we have a new President and a new Congress both of which most observers feel have accepted in good faith a popular mandate to take a new look at many of our institutions and their behavior. More important, we have an avowed desire on the part of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in charge of customs to revise and modernize customs laws. We have a Commissioner of Customs who feels from past experience that cooperation and communications between the government and private customs bars should be expanded. Finally, I submit to you that we have an American Bar Association that in the last two years—under the leadership of Presidents Chesterfield Smith and Jimmy Fellers—has become a lively and active force in the United States, willing to grasp a nettle of problems that confront us.

The American Bar Association appeals to you who are in this room—lawyers whose professional lives are devoted to customs—to seize this opportunity to fulfill the expressed hopes of Secretary Macdonald and Commissioner Acree and to serve the public interest in the finest sense by joining—actually by leading—the reformation of customs laws and administration in the United States.

To that fine rhetoric you may well respond to me: enough generalities—what are the problem areas that should be dealt with and what are the priorities? I once had the privilege of visiting with the late Senator Kerr of North Carolina. I asked him whether he considered himself a conservative or a liberal. He said, "Son, I'm a liberal, and I'll tell you what a liberal is. A liberal is somebody who wants to do what should have been done by common consent 20 years ago." Under that definition, I think that all of us are liberals. I think a few of these changes that should enjoy broad agreement are on the tip of all our tongues.

Should we really have 9 different methods of valuation and continue to use the old law valuation, which was supposed to be thrown out by the Customs Simplification Act of 1956?

Are the column 2 duties the best way to safeguard our economy against political enemies?

Can't we find streamlined ways of assessing and collecting duties on the billions of dollars of imports without dealing with each entry separately?

Should we find better ways to encourage the businesslike compromise of classification and appraisal disputes?

Can't we come up with a better way to handle the 592 problem for the benefit of both the government and the importer?

Can't drawback be simplified and expedited?

However, it would be presumptuous of me, or any other lawyer outside government, to assume that I can prepare your household's laundry list. You must be the ones to step forward and identify the problem areas and assign priorities. I would like to call on you today—now—to help identify areas of the customs laws and regulations that should be renovated. I ask you now to tell me what changes should have been made by common consent 20 years ago. In that way, we will have construction and not confrontation at the Customs Corral.

FRIENDS MEETING HOUSE

HON. GEORGE A. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, the Friends Meeting House of York, Pa., stands as a precious colonial artifact, a symbol of the beginning of an independent America. It is a 208-year-old house of worship that stands at 135 West Philadelphia Street in York, Pa.

Its beginning was in 1766, when a small group of York citizens, members of the Society of Friends, Quakers, subscribed their pounds and shillings toward the construction of their own meeting house.

Mr. William Willis, a Friend, laid the bricks for the Friends Meeting House, and a testimonial to Willis' study handiwork is the realization that the eastern half of this still-standing Friends Meeting House is the work of his hand.

But even the sturdy handiwork of William Willis cannot withstand the ravages of time and vandals, and today there is a need for a comprehensive restoration effort. A new roof is needed, probably of hard split cedar shakes, and there is a need for extensive painting and repointing of all the brickwork.

A conservative estimate of the total restoration cost is $25,000, and here is a very interesting fact: No Federal or State of Pennsylvania funds are being sought to carry this restoration work forward. This is indeed unusual in this day and age of extensive Federal and State financial contributions for all types of projects. Here we find a dramatic demonstration of the independent spirit that has characterized and identified Americans.

An appeal is going out to private citizens for donations to finance the needed restoration of this 208-year-old meeting house in York, Pa. Contributions are being solicited, with contributors being asked to make their checks payable to the York Meeting House restoration fund. They are being asked to send these checks to Mr. Eldon Leech, treasurer, York Meeting House restoration fund, 1600 Monroe Street, York, Pa. 17404.

In the meantime the restoration work is going forward because of the generous contributions of skilled craftsmen and tradesmen. Building trade unions have volunteered the labor of masons, carpenters, and electricians. Construction firms have volunteered building materials in the form of bricks, lime, sand, cement, and iron railings. A retaining wall at the entrance, previously destroyed by vandals, has been rebuilt. In addition, new railings will soon be installed in various sections of the building.

Mr. Speaker, I am indeed proud to represent the congressional district where this remarkable independent effort to restore the York Friends Meeting House is now in process. If contributors will lend their enthusiastic support to this restoration project, York County's oldest house of worship, the York Friends Meeting House, should be in good order for the 1976 Bicentennial.

LEVONE A. YARDUM

HON. JAMES C. CORMAN
OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. CORMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to bring to the attention of my colleagues the dedicated and ambitious service of LeVone A. Yardum, retiring president of the San Fernando Valley Bar Association.

Mr. Yardum has contributed his enthusiasm, dedication, and skills in an effort to make our community more responsive to the needs of our people. During the last year as president of the San Fernando Valley Bar Association he has been instrumental in inspiring high professional standards for the legal community and extending the life of our invaluable legal aid program. He has continued to exercise good judgment and leadership in the effort to obtain badly needed court facilities for the Northwest Valley.

Beyond his many efforts to help the legal community, LeVone has been an active participant in civic and ethnic organizations including past president of the Sherman Oaks Kiwanis Club, Board Member of the Sherman Oaks Chamber of Commerce, chairman of the Legal Aid Board of SFVBA, and past State president of the California Division of the Armenian American Citizens League.

His service has been longstanding, his contributions many. LeVone's successor will have a difficult act to follow.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

TRIBUTE TO JEROME ZEIFMAN

HON. ROBERT MCCLORY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. MCCLORY. Mr. Speaker, after more than 13 years of exceptional service to the Committee on the Judiciary, Jerry Zeifman is leaving Washington to teach law at the University of Santa Clara. Although we all regret this decision, I must note that he has chosen a new career for which he is very well qualified—for, as general counsel of the committee, he has done an excellent job in preparing the members to deal with the extremely complex legal and constitutional issues which have been considered during this Congress.

Mr. Speaker, Jerry Zeifman commands the respect of his colleagues with a soft-spoken intelligence that informs his listeners without the kind of flamboyance that grabs media attention in these chaotic days. Before Jerry departs, however, I want to set the record straight so that the House and the American people will understand and appreciate the tremendous services he has performed and the seminal role which he has played in the most crucial matters to have been before the Judiciary Committee in this century.

Jerry Zeifman's dedication to the Constitution and to the rule of law in this society have served the Congress and the country well during his tenure as chief counsel of the committee. As Chairman ROBINO's right hand during the crises which have engulfed this Congress, he shares a large portion of the credit for the nonpartisan and impartial way in which the affairs of the committee have been conducted. He has been a solid and trusted adviser to members of the minority as well as members of the majority. He has made a tremendous contribution to the achievements of the Judiciary Committee in this Congress. In particular, Jerry Zeifman's actions and recommendations have reflected a profound love and respect for this House. During the impeachment inquiry, he was second to none in his efforts to preserve and protect the prerogatives of the legislature under our constitutional system.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that I speak for many of my colleagues on the Judiciary Committee as well as myself in saying that Jerry will be sorely missed when the 94th Congress convenes. My wife, Doris, and I join in wishing him and his family our fondest regards as they leave our midst.

MADNESS OF WAR IN PHNOM PENH

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, Congress has recently approved the Foreign Assistance Act of 1974. Included in the legislation is an authorized ceiling of $377 million for military and economic aid to Cambodia and, in addition, an extra $75 million is provided for military assistance through drawdown authority of Defense Department stocks. Although these funds are less than the administration sought, they will be used to fuel a long and tragic war.

Sydney H. Schanberg has filed a report to the New York Times which captures the tragedy, inhumanity, suffering, doubletalk, corruption, and madness of war in Cambodia. His article, which follows, dramatically illustrates how funds from outside powers are transformed into human suffering in Cambodia.

[From the New York Times, Dec. 17, 1974]
REPORTER'S NOTEBOOK: MADNESS OF WAR IN PHNOM PENH

(By Sydney H. Schanberg)

PHNOM PENH, CAMBODIA.—Events in Cambodia have become misshapen in the image of the madness of this war—like the time when, at an evening reception, the armed forces commander, Lieut. Gen. Sosthene Fernandez, was asked by an acquaintance what he planned to do if the United States Congress went ahead with its plans to cut aid to Cambodia sharply. The general smiled impishly, strode to the other end of the room, threw his arms into the air in the posture of surrender and declared in French: "I'll do this."

Was he at all serious? No one at the reception really thought so. But then, a large cut in aid could really bring about the collapse of this corrupt and ineffective Government. Beyond that the war against the Communist-led Cambodian insurgents, now nearly five years old, has warped human behavior here out of any normal, predictable patterns. UP is sometimes one's old schoolmate or, often enough, an uncle or cousin. Perhaps General Fernandez was merely disguising the truth with buffoonery.

BLACK HUMOR IS AN OUTLET

Indeed, black humor is one way of living with the grotesqueness of conditions here—with the Government printing money as fast as it can to keep up with a 300 percent a year inflation rate reminiscent of Kuomintang China, and with Cambodia's population of seven million being mangled at a daily rate of at least 300 killed and wounded.

The insurgents hold the countryside and have cut most of the roads. The Government holds the fairly isolated cities and towns, including this capital city, now bursting with refugees. Both armies are Cambodian, but their ability to go on destroying their country and each other is controlled by the outside powers that provide their weapons while failing to provide peace talks. To participate in such a situation is to be slightly insane.

What follows is a compilation of some of the slightly insane things—odd and aberrant and sad—that happened during a three-week visit.

An American economic consultant on contract to the United States Embassy was having a pre-dinner drink with his wife and some acquaintances beside the pool at the charmingly seedy Hotel Le Phnom. One of the acquaintances, a reporter, who had taken a trip up a battle-scarred road that day, commented that the Cambodians were tired and worn out with the war. The consultant vigorously disagreed.

"They're not tired," he said. "They're not tired at all. That's nonsense. All they need is some good leadership. A hundred Israeli commando officers could turn this thing around, or any hundred good officers."

The reporter asked where such leaders could be found in the present Cambodian Government.

"It's not hopeless," the consultant insisted. "This war can be won."

December 20, 1974

December 20, 1974

"Oh, come on, John," interjected his wife, who had been silent until then. "You know you're just as discouraged as everyone else. You're just saying that because he's a newsman."

He said nothing, she rose, and they went to dinner.

"It's hopeless, just hopeless," said a candid American diplomat at lunch one day. "The only thing they could possibly do to save things here is to take out the whole palace entourage and shoot them. Get rid of this corrupt leadership and try someone new—anyone. It's probably too late for it to work, but it's the only thing that has any chance at all."

There are beggars everywhere in Phnom Penh. A blind one sits on the sidewalk every day outside La Taverne, a restaurant opposite the post office, playing a Cambodian-style zither. As the dominant clientele has changed with the progress of the war from the old colonial French to the new Americans, so have the blind beggar's songs. These days he makes a fairly good living playing "In the Mood" and "Alexander's Ragtime Band."

Downtown Phnom Penh is a montage of unhappiness. So Leang, a 33-year-old teacher cannot feed his family on his salary, equivalent to $9 a month, so he pedals a bicycle rickshaw in his free hours, earning 30 cents on a good day. He says that he is hungry all the time, that he is eating the kind of lotus-pond greens that Cambodians used to feed to their ducks. "I'm miserable," he keeps repeating.

Twenty yards away, at a sidewalk foodstall, ragged, begrimed refugee children hunker near the tables, snatching at the chicken bones cast off by the customers, and sucking and chewing on them until nothing is left.

On the other side of the street, three soldiers—two of them missing a leg and the other apparently uninjured—stand in shop doorways, silent, waiting, their faces contorted in the professional beggar's half smiling grimace. Sometimes the shopkeepers give them 10 riels—about six-tenths of a cent.

Down the block, at Mekong River port, workmen are unloading bags of rice and corn from barges. They are paid next to nothing, so they try to hide some of the grain droppings in special pockets and sacks they have sewn on the inside of their scarecrow clothes. As they leave work through a narrow opening in the steel gate, the military policemen whap at the workers' pregnant bulges with their hands and nightsticks, until the corn and rice spills on the ground.

An American Embassy official, during an interview, brought up the old controversy over whether the approximately 100 American military men at the embassy ever break the Congressional ban against acting as military advisers to the Cambodians or whether they stick to their stated jobs of gathering battle information and supervising the delivery and use of American arms. The official said the embassy was being extremely careful not to give military advice.

Then his telephone rang. He spoke in urgent tones for a few minutes and came back to explain that the insurgents had just badly shot up a river supply convoy and that two barges carrying 1,000 tons of rice were floating free and about to fall into insurgent hands. The Cambodian high command wanted to know what to do, he said.

"They asked our advice," he went on without thinking. Then he thought—and broke into an embarrassed grin.

As it turned out, the Cambodians, who asked permission to sink the barges by bombing them, to keep the insurgents from getting the rice, were "advised" not to do that because the barges themselves were costly and worth saving. In the end, however, the Cambodian Navy was unable to save the barges, the rice went to the insurgents and the operation was a total loss.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Some people here have made a lot of money on the war, for nothing is corruption-proof any more in Cambodia. For example, there is something called the Exchange Support Fund, a $35-million-a-year fund consisting largely of American dollars for the use of the Cambodian Government to help pay for crucial foreign goods needed for the war effort. Luxury items are expressly forbidden.

About three months ago, the Government gave a local merchant $50,000 from the fund to import foreign beer, and more recently it released $175,000 for the import of cigarette lighters.

With morale low, draft evasion has become more the rule than the exception. Young men pay bribes for all kinds of exemption papers. One of the more bizarre exemptions is known as the "lop-lop" certificate. "Lop-lop," in translation, is equivalent to "crazy." One healthy Cambodian was asked what his lop-lop certificate said. "It says I'm out of my mind and I don't have to serve," he replied. He got the certificate fairly cheaply at—only 50,000 riels, or about $31.

Bribes for other things are much higher. Teachers—badly underpaid and in a mutinous mood for a long time—have been demanding and getting 500,000 riels from students for the school diploma necessary to enter the university.

The Pentagon is still specializing in double talk about Cambodia. When a Wisconsin member of Congress charged last month that American pilots flying supplies to Cambodia were receiving combat pay, even though the Administration contends that no American troops are engaged in combat here, the Pentagon replied that the term "combat pay" was incorrect—it was "hostile-fire pay."

At about the same time, a newspaper report said that American military analysts in Thailand were making bombing recommendations to the Cambodians on the basis of American reconnaissance flights over insurgent territory.

The Pentagon acted to clear up the confusion immediately. Targets are not being recommended, it said, for this would be a violation of the Congressional ban on advisory and combat activities. What is actually happening, the Pentagon explained, is that "items of intelligence interest" are "identified" and "passed on" to the Cambodians, but "the judgment of what should be done" is left entirely to them.

Tor Keu is one of the thousands of child soldiers in the Cambodian Army. They join for many reasons, but mostly because it is a way to make a little money to live and eat on.

Tor Keu says he is 18 because that is the legal age for enlistment, but his is a frightened 12 at most. He has been in the army for a month.

It is dusk and he is walking along Route five northwest of Phnom Penh, on his way to meet his soldier father—his mother is dead—at an outpost a few miles ahead.

Tor Keu is carrying a carbine of World War II vintage and his uniform is double his size: his shirt-front is held together by a safety pin and his trousers are so pitifully baggy and clownlike that they drag on the ground until he trips. Asked what he has had to eat during the day, he stares wanly at the ground and mumbles: "Nothing. Only a little fish paste."

On Nov. 28, the United States' Thanksgiving Day, a large group of top Cambodian officials—mostly generals—gathered nervously at Marshal Lon Nol's Presidential palace to await the outcome of the United Nations vote on the Cambodian issue. The outcome could have brought a collapse of this Government had the United Nations seat for Cambodia been awarded to the insurgents, whose nominal leader is Prince Norodom Sihanouk.

When news of the narrow two-vote victory came, jubilation erupted. The generals, led by General Fernandez their commander, began jiggling around the room, singing an old French children's ditty, "Tout Va Très Bien"—"Everything's All Right."

The generals, however, were singing only the title line and had apparently forgotten, or had never known, the rest of the song, in which things are anything but all right.

As the song goes on, stanza after stanza, the butler explains to the Marquise, who is telephoning from her Paris town house to find how things are going on her country estate, "Everything is all right, Madame Marquise," except that the kitchen is on fire, the barn has burned down, her husband, the Marquis, has died and, finally, "Your favorite horse has died as well."

Cambodians are proud and independent people, and though the war has forced many of them to accept charity and even to beg, the shame lies deep.

In a village on the western edge of Phnom Penh, a family of five was slowly starving. Neither the husband nor the wife nor any of the children, could find a job. Next door lived a widower who raised pigs and was reasonably well off. He began to notice that the food he was leaving out for the pigs was disappearing, and suddenly realized that his desperate neighbors were sneaking over at night and taking the pig food to sustain themselves.

The widower felt bad about their condition, but he did not want to embarrass them. After carefully rehearsing what he was going to say, he went over to their house one day when the husband was out and said to the wife that everyone was suffering in Cambodia these days, but that he was fortunate enough to have a little extra, so would she please accept 10,000 riels to buy some food.

The wife wept in shame as she took the money. Then she went out and bought some rice and fish—but her sense of disgrace overcame her. So she bought some poison, too. That night she put the poison in the food and killed herself and all her family.

KMS INDUSTRIES

HON. MARVIN L. ESCH

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues an article in Fortune magazine concerning KMS Industries and their work on laser fusion. Although a relatively small company, KMS Industries has made significant progress in the area of laser fusion, progress that has seemed to elude the more expensive efforts of the Federal Government. I think my colleagues will find their work very exciting and innovative, and I would urge they take the time to read the article:

KMS INDUSTRIES BETS ITS LIFE ON LASER FUSION

(By Gene Bylinsky)

In the world of thermonuclear-fusion research, a certain bigness prevails—immense potentialities for the future, grand-scale efforts to overcome the technical obstacles, huge costs that only governments can afford. Yet a small company in Ann Arbor, Michigan, has been agitating that world with some seemingly audacious claims of success. KMS Fusion, Inc., says its scientists have mastered the key mechanism of laser-driven fusion—a feat that has so far eluded the big teams of government researchers in both the U.S. and the Soviet Union, as well as smaller groups in Great Britain, France, Japan, and West Germany.

What's more, the brash little company attained its results with exceedingly low laser energy. This raises questions about the soundness of U.S. and Soviet plans to build mammoth lasers, which many scientists in both countries think are needed to attain success.

Experimental proof that laser fusion can be made to work would strengthen hopes that this new approach will leapfrog the older, more ponderous schemes to achieve fusion through magnetic confinement. (See "Lasers Blast a Shortcut to the Ultimate Energy Solution," FORTUNE, May.) Trying to kindle on earth the fusion that powers the stars, scientists have attempted to confine ionized gas, called plasma, inside magnetic fields, or "magnetic bottles," in the innards of big and expensive apparatus. In the interior of the sun and other stars, fusion takes place because of enormous gravitational pressure. Inside the experimental devices on earth, the plasma has to be compressed and heated electromagnetically to ignition. (Fusion scientists use terms such as "ignition" even though fusion, in which nuclei of light elements merge, is a different kind of process from chemical combustion.) There has been encouraging progress in magnetic confinement lately, but after nearly a quarter century of research and expenditures of more than $500 million in the U.S. alone, that approach hasn't lit the magic fire. A major difficulty is leakage from the magnetic bottles.

THREATENING TO UPSET THE SCENARIO

Laser fusion greatly simplifies the confinement scheme. Converging laser beams would hold a tiny ball of fuel for a brilliant moment, compressing it to a density 100 times that of lead and thus starting ignition. The resultant flux of neutrons would be captured as heat and transformed into electricity or made to do other useful work.

In the U.S., large-scale work on laser fusion began only about five years ago. The Soviet Union started earlier and now runs an impressive effort. The U.S. has been building up a similar enterprise, with $64 million in federal funds going into laser fusion in fiscal 1975. As part of the expanding federal program, a huge $25-million laser will be built at the AEC's Lawrence Livermore Laboratory near San Francisco to become operational in 1977. The Soviet Union is building a similar laser. Official U.S. plans do not call for possible commercial use of laser fusion until about the end of this century.

When KMS Fusion barged in, threatening to upset this leisurely scenario, the not unreasonable question arose how a small company, the only private company working directly in the field, could have outdone the government projects of the superpowers. Some skeptics suggested that KMS Fusion had made up the story to raise funds so that it could continue research in laser fusion. But the doubts faded considerably as the company kept reporting further advances. At a meeting of the American Physical Society in Albuquerque in October, 500 scientists listening to a KMS scientist reporting on the latest tests burst into applause when he finished.

What KMS Fusion has done so far, to be sure, is a very early step toward eventual construction of laser-fusion reactors. The company's scientists succeeded at the end of 1973 in using laser light to produce a slight compression of tiny glass pellets filled with deuterium and tritium (isotopes of hydrogen). Last May, they compressed the pellets further and started getting some energy output in the form of neutrons from the pellets—the first time anyone had obtained compression neutrons. In late October, by turning up the laser power a little, they got much greater compressions and a lot more neutrons. The company thus appears to be on the right course toward the next step, ignition inside the barely visible pellet. This would be equivalent to the first successful chain reaction in fission.

A FIREFLY 100 MILES AWAY

There is a great difference, of course, between the tiny sizzle in the microscopic pellet that KMS has achieved so far and the brilliant intensity of a full-fledged fusion burn that must precede net energy production. In the words of one scientist, it is "the difference between a firefly 100 miles away and a lightning stroke." Still, KMS has overcome what many scientists in the field considered to be the critical challenge in laser fusion: compressing the fuel pellet symmetrically so as to avoid producing instabilities that would prematurely break it apart.

In a reactor, laser energy would implode perhaps dozens of such pellets each second, one after another. Before KMS conducted its pathfinding experiments there was a question whether the basic process that underlies the concept of laser fusion could be made to work. The company's experiments showed that it could. Scientists at the Atomic Energy Commission and their Soviet counterparts now call the KMS feat "a significant first step" toward attainment of controlled laser fusion.

That a small private company has outdone huge governmental research efforts is no surprise to the energetic man behind it, mathematician-businessman Keeve M. Siegel, fifty-one, who endowed his company with his own initials. Siegel believes in "the lesson of the Cavendish Laboratory," the famous British research establishment "where a few bright people outinvented the world for a long period of time. And they did this literally with wires and chewing gum. There, the people motivated each other. In a small company, there is that same kind of drive for success. Whether the drive is motivated by the scientific people like it was at Cavendish, or by the desire to make a buck, I think that's all incidental."

Siegel's own motivation includes but also transcends the desire to make money. He is already a millionaire from a previous venture in high technology, so he can afford to indulge in some philosophy, too. A noted physicist says that Siegel "has developed a Jehovah complex over laser fusion." Siegel speaks intensely and persuasively about laser fusion as a new source of unlimited energy, at once freeing the U.S. from its dependence on imported oil and cooling the inflationary fever too.

USING NEUTRONS TO FILL PIPELINES

A boldly innovative aspect of the KMS approach is the idea of utilizing fusion neutrons not to produce electricity, as almost everyone else in fusion research wants to do, but to produce methane, the principal ingredient in natural gas. The neutrons would be used to break down water molecules into their constituent elements, hydrogen and oxygen. The hydrogen would be converted into methane, which would be put straight into pipelines.

This novel idea evokes admiration on the part of some of the experts who have talked about a "hydrogen economy," in which hydrogen (produced by electrolysis) would be substituted for natural gas. Because hydrogen is so volatile, that transformation would be complex and costly, requiring extensive changeover in distribution lines, storage facilities, pumping stations, household appliances, and other hardware. The alternative "methane economy" that Siegel is preaching would supplement our supplies of natural gas (which is more than 80 percent methane) while leaving pipelines, pumps, and appliances intact. To prove out the process, KMS

Fusion is already producing hydrogen "by the thimbleful and bucketful," as Siegel puts it, with neutrons from conventional generators.

Since fusion can generate more energy per pound of fuel than any other reaction, the use of fusion neutrons to produce hydrogen could be an inexpensive and highly efficient process. The lack of cheap hydrogen has been an impediment to economic coal gasification. With cheap fusion-generated hydrogen, it would be possible to produce methane cheaply and abundantly by making hydrogen react with coal or with carbon derived from limestone. "If it works," says the chairman of a pipeline company that supports research at KMS Fusion, "it will be like the invention of the electric light."

Siegel and his associates figure that by taking the shortcut from pellet to pipeline, their company could cut years from the development of economic fusion power. The design of a methane generator would be simpler than that of an electricity-generating fusion plant. Scientists at KMS Fusion talk about having a pilot methane generator operating about five years from now if the company gets enough financial and technical help from the government and from larger companies.

Most researchers at the AEC and at universities consider such optimism nothing short of reckless. Although they admire the technical achievements at KMS Fusion, these experts, almost to a man, don't see a demonstration power reactor until the mid-1990's.

STEEP HEIGHTS TO BE SCALED

Crucial tests to settle the issue may be performed in the next few months, or at the most in the next few years. Ignition will be a critical step. After that must come "scientific breakeven," where the flux of energetic neutrons and alpha particles from the fusion process equals the energy in the laser beam applied on the pellet. Another steep height to be scaled will be "total breakeven," or "engineering breakeven," where the energy produced by the pellet exceeds the energy put into the overall system that powers the laser. After that comes the tough engineering task of developing the fusion reactor.

So far, KMS Fusion has invested $19 million in laser fusion. Some outsiders doubt the company's ability to last out what they view as a long and arduous race. Siegel, who puts the cost of a methane pilot plant at about $85 million, readily concedes the possibility of having to drop out. "You are not talking to a corporation whose future is assured," he says, "and as chief executive I have told that to my shareholders."

A TOUCH OF THE GAMBLER

The answer to the question of what such a small company is doing in such an expensive and demanding field involves the ambitions and dreams of "Kip" Siegel. He is a man of huge girth and huge ego, energized by a pressing need to be liked, praised, and appreciated. An expert on electromagnetic theory and a former University of Michigan professor, Siegel has long cherished the dream of building a major corporation. He made at least $4 million from his previous venture, Conductron Corp. He has faced skepticism before. While running Conductron, he proposed a technique to make U.S. missile nose cones less vulnerable to enemy radar. Some scientists said it couldn't be done, but Siegel went ahead and proved it could.

Siegel is something of a gambler. He is part owner of a stable of trotters and likes to watch his horses run. What gamble, if it pays off, would pay more than a bet on a solution to the energy predicament? His bet on laser fusion is a big one. He has been selling off divisions of KMS Industries, the parent company, to keep KMS Fusion going, and has put in about $3 million of his own as well.

Siegel had no intention of getting into laser fusion when he started KMS Industries in 1967. Conductron, a profitable electronics company, had been absorbed into McDonnell Aircraft Corp., and Siegel had resigned after a disagreement with Chairman James S. McDonnell. Rebounding with amazing speed, Siegel took only a week to found KMS Industries. He assembled a pool of scientists—many followed him from Conductron—and began installing them in old, experienced, but technically backward companies that he acquired with KMS stock. His idea was to invigorate these companies with new technological skills and new products to be marketed through their established sales channels.

KMS Industries reached sales of $12.2 million in its first year, and leaped to $51.7 million in its second, partly thanks to acquisitions. During 1967-69, KMS Industries acquired no less than forty-six companies. Then, in late 1969, Siegel discovered laser fusion.

NEEDED: A NEW IDEA

The concept that KMS Fusion has used so successfully was worked out by Keith A. Brueckner, an imaginative theoretical physicist. Starting in 1968, Brueckner divided his time between the University of California at San Diego and a KMS subsidiary in southern California. He also spent about eight days a year as a consultant to the AEC's magnetic-confinement program.

In the course of his work for the AEC, Brueckner could observe the high interest in laser fusion in the Soviet Union and elsewhere. He tried to prod the AEC into starting an active program and even presided over a meeting to discuss the subject. But laser fusion got a cool reception because the AEC scientists at the meeting believed, among other things, that very large and much more efficient lasers would be needed to achieve success.

Brueckner then asked Siegel what it would take for KMS to underwrite a fusion project. "A new idea," Siegel said. Not long afterward, Brueckner came up with one. He worked out a compression and implosion scheme that by his calculations would require far less laser power than the AEC calculations suggested.

Siegel and Brueckner approached the AEC. From their understanding of the Atomic Energy Act, they assumed that Brueckner's results would not be patentable. Accordingly, they were surprised when the AEC's research director urged them to file patents.

It turned out, however, that a number of AEC scientists had secretly worked on implosion schemes on and off since the late 1950's. The news of KMS's entry into laser fusion therefore raised a lot of eyebrows in Livermore and other AEC labs. The AEC had no patents in the field because it had considered laser fusion to be related to weapons development. Yet here was a private company applying for patents that touched on the AEC's own secret work aimed at a potential use of the laser as an H-bomb trigger. (Even today, that concept remains impractical. A laser big enough to trigger an H-bomb would cost perhaps $10 million, and it would have to be transported by ship. Says Brueckner, "You could do more damage by dropping the laser than by dropping the bomb.")

BATTLING ATOMIC BUREAUCRATS

Brueckner and KMS got caught in the whirlwind. The commission got tough and directed KMS to stop its laser-fusion research, on the ground that the work related to nuclear weapons. The AEC conceded that it couldn't stop Brueckner from thinking, but instructed him to stop discussing the ideas with his co-workers. He was also prohibited from doing any calculations relating to laser fusion, except in his head.

The AEC tried to talk KMS into quitting the field, but Siegel decided to fight. He hired lawyers and even wrote a letter to President Nixon. Slowly, the AEC eased its restrictions. In February, 1971, the commission gave KMS a contract that allowed the company to work in laser fusion without government funds, without access to government information, but under government control. The AEC also reserved the right to contest any patents issued to KMS.

The toughest provision prohibited KMS from hiring any scientist, technician, or engineer who had ever worked in federal laser or nuclear-weapons programs. The AEC interpreted this provision literally. KMS officials recall that once when they submitted a list of fifteen proposed employees, the agency turned down thirteen; it approved only the two secretaries on the list. This kind of thing effectively limited hiring to people with no experience in the field.

To provide leadership for Siegel's scientists, Brueckner took a leave of absence from his teaching post. Late in 1971, he and five other scientists from the KMS subsidiary in California moved to Ann Arbor. To further strengthen newly organized KMS Fusion, Inc., Siegel had brought in Henry J. Gomberg, an experienced nuclear scientist, as president of the enterprise. Toward the end of 1971, Gomberg succeeded in convincing James Schlesinger, who had just become AEC chairman, to make a new interpretation of the contract with KMS so that the company could hire scientists and technicians who had left AEC or defense jobs at least two years earlier. That greatly eased the recruiting difficulties.

Delayed in its schedule for about two years, KMS was able to begin large-scale work only in 1971. For about $1 million it bought from Compagnie Générale d'Electricité in France the biggest and most powerful laser system that was commercially available. Made of glass containing a touch of the element neodymium, the laser was so large it could be flown to New York only in a Boeing 747 cargo plane. It was then shipped to Ann Arbor in specially equipped vans.

TRICKS WITH MIRRORS

In efforts to achieve symmetrical compression of the fuel pellet, most laser-fusion projects split the laser beam into a large number of sub-beams and have them converge on the target from many directions. But this approach introduces the difficult problem of synchronizing and focusing the beams so that they will all hit a target the size of a grain of dust in the same billionth or trillionth of a second.

Under pressure to minimize costs, KMS took a quite different approach: splitting the laser beam only once, and using mirrors and lenses to illuminate the pellet from many directions. This was a much more elegant solution than the multiple-beam approach.

Another important advance was the "pulse stacker." With this instrument, the ultra-short laser pulse can be stretched, accordion-like, so that when the pulse hits the pellet the pressure is applied in a graduated way. Without a "pulse stacker," the laser's short blast would hit the pellet like a hammer.

KMS also started developing new types of fuel pellets and learning how to mass-produce them. This was no easy task since it involves extremely close tolerances and the use of radioactive tritium gas. The deuterium and tritium are diffused into the tiny glass spheres by heating under pressure; the gas becomes trapped inside when the pellets are cooled. KMS has mastered the process to such an extent that it can mass-produce the pellets for less than a hundredth of a cent apiece.

Even with innovative and successful efforts to hold down on costs, fusion research is very expensive. What's more, Siegel moved into fusion at a time when KMS Industries was already facing financial stress. The trouble came in an avalanche. First, the 1969 recession. KMS stock plunged from 73 a share to 12½. Then, early in 1970, the company was suddenly asked to repay $16.7 million to Detroit's Bank of the Commonwealth, which found itself in trouble, and a year later another $5 million to John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co., which had purchased a twenty-year debenture but now, wary of the fusion venture, wanted its money back.

To pay off the debts and get money for the fusion project, Siegel started selling off divisions. In many cases he tried to sell to previous owners, and often he succeeded. Graphic Services went back to its original owners for $1.7 million. So did the lens division, for $896,000. A few months later, Vail-Ballou, a book-manufacturing company, was sold to Maple Press for $4.8 million. The divisions went fast after that: two more in 1970, eight in 1971, five in 1972, two in 1973.

Today KMS Industries has only six divisions left, including fusion, and is seeking to dispose of most of the remaining nonfusion work. With most divisions gone, total sales have fallen from a high of $59 million in 1969 to $6 million in 1973; the stock declined to an all-time low of 1½ this year.

From the "cannibalizing," as Siegel calls it, the company took in $33 million. To get more funds for fusion research, Siegel tried to attract big companies as partners. In 1972, Texas Gas Transmission Corp., concerned over the possibility that its natural-gas pipelines would be only half full in 1980, decided to support KMS research into fusion-produced hydrogen. It has so far contributed about $1.6 million.

TOWARD THE MOST FOR THE BUCK

To help finance the fusion side of the work, Siegel succeeded in late 1973 in signing on Burmah Oil Co. Ltd., the huge British petroleum concern. Burmah has so far guaranteed bank loans of $12.5 million and has options to buy up to 20 percent of the company for up to $27.9 million.

With its own money and Burmah's guarantees, KMS Fusion constructed and equipped a "shooting gallery," where the rifle-like cracks of laser firings resound as the tiny pellets are blasted in a vacuum chamber at the rate of about ten shots a day.

Brueckner's calculations had looked so good that Siegel had expansively predicted that KMS would achieve scientific breakeven by December 31, 1973. But the technical problems turned out tougher than expected. By the end of 1973, KMS Fusion was still far from that goal, although it could report some slight compressions of the pellets, without generation of "true" fusion neutrons. (It is relatively easy to obtain "false" neutrons from the corona that forms around the fuel pellet.) The Russians were reporting similar results.

A major milestone in KMS Fusion's drive for what Siegel calls "the most neutrons for the buck" was reached at 4:30 p.m. last May 1. The pop of pellet shot No. 1036 had just echoed through the "shooting gallery" when Roy Johnson, a young physicist who supervises the experiments, tore off a Polaroid print from a recording camera and shouted somewhat hysterically: "We've got neutrons!"

CHAMPAGNE AND INCREDULITY

Other instruments were also indicating that the pellet had been compressed and imploded. If they were right, KMS scientists were the first in the world to see laser fusion taking place, though only on a tiny scale.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Brueckner went out and returned with a case of champagne for the scientific crew.

Siegel telephoned the scientist he had recruited to be KMS Fusion's "test monitor": Nobel Prize-winning physicist Robert Hofstadter of Stanford University. (He was then director of Stanford's big high-energy laboratory.) Hofstadter flew in to observe additional tests. The experiment was successfully repeated four times before KMS reported the facts to the AEC, which reviews the company's progress and all its public statements about laser fusion.

The news, as released, met with a lot of incredulity. Part of the problem was that KMS was caught between the SEC, which requires immediate disclosure of important developments, and the AEC, which censored some important facts because of concern about security. Both criteria conflict with the scientific procedure of first presenting papers at meetings and publishing them in journals. Not until August did the AEC declassify the fact that KMS had been using a new kind of pellet, a glass sphere filled with hydrogen isotopes. One newspaper, not familiar with the AEC's role in the disclosures, even claimed that the AEC had questioned the use of the word "unambiguously"—which in fact the AEC had suggested—in the KMS news release press reports.

The skepticism generally faded after a large contingent of AEC scientists came to KMS for a briefing and after KMS scientists showed they could repeat the compressions easily. Says John Nuckolls of Livermore Lab, a leading theoretician, "These are the best laser-implosion experiments so far."

Continuing to scale up compressions and neutron yields, KMS recently achieved compressions of 250 times by volume and obtained seven million neutrons per shot. The company hopes to achieve ignition and scientific break-even in the next year and a half.

In sunny Livermore, they proudly point to a big hole in the ground where a three-story building will rise to house that huge laser. AEC scientists there express doubt that KMS can move as fast as it says it can. "KMS," says Nuckolls, "has come out of the starting gate with a quarter horse in a mile race. The race has gone about a quarter of a mile so far and just watch the next quarter. I think they have about run their horse out. Now the longer-running horses can take over."

Nuckolls means that the KMS laser is not powerful enough for KMS to get much further, but he admits that he doesn't really know whether scientific break-even can be achieved with a laser that size. It's a difficult time to be a theoretician in this fast-moving field, and KMS Fusion appears to be rewriting the theory. The AEC badly underestimated KMS when it blandly stated in 1971: "We do not foresee KMS proceeding at a pace in advances of our laboratories. We do not believe it will be possible for such a firm to compete with the vast experience and resources of our laboratories."

LIVING FROM MONTH TO MONTH

So far, KMS Fusion has proved the AEC wrong. But even if the company soon attains a net energy gain with its present laser, a number of tough engineering barriers stand in the way of a laser-fusion reactor. The laser would have to fire at pellets at a rate of as many as 6,000 times a minute. No such laser exists today, although there are prospects under development.

Another difficult task is designing reactor chamber walls that would withstand the constant battering by neutrons and alpha particles, and the mechanical strains of millions of consecutive pellet explosions, each amounting to several pounds of TNT. Siegel insists, however, that KMS has made significant progress in designing reactor walls for hydrogen production. He dismisses other scientists' doubts with an optimistic "What they think are hard problems aren't." In his view, the problems KMS faces are no longer scientific. "The major obstacle is me and my ability to raise money. I don't think it's science anymore. It's financial break-even," Adds a KMS executive: "Everything is a cliff-hanger. We practically live from month to month."

Much more is at stake, of course, than the personal triumph or defeat of Keesee M. Siegel or any other scientist. It is entirely possible that KMS Fusion will fail for lack of funds before it has had a chance to prove its concepts. "If Siegel and his scientists are right in the parameters they've set," says a friend, "then everybody will be the loser if the project is not pursued to a successful conclusion."

FEDERAL WATER POLLUTION CONTROL ACT, SECTION 402(k)

HON. FRANK M. CLARK

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, on June 26, 1974, the Subcommittee on Investigations and Review of the House Public Works Committee held an oversight hearing on the implementation of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, as amended, at which the Environmental Protection Agency and the electric utility industry presented testimony. At that hearing the EPA was asked:

If a discharger has not been issued an NPDES permit by 12/31/74, even though he has applied for one, can the discharger be found in violation of the FWPCA?

The EPA responded that—

We (EPA) . . . interpret the section (FWPCA section 402(k)) not to create a change in the legal status of dischargers, and subsequent to that date (12/31/74) a discharger should not be considered in violation of the Act while his application is pending for permit to perform the action, which would otherwise be a violation . . .

This legal opinion was reaffirmed by a letter to the House Public Works Committee from Alan G. Kirk III, Assistant Administrator for Enforcement and General Counsel, EPA, dated July 23, 1974.

If a different interpretation of section 402(k) should be rendered, all industries would be exposed to the civil and criminal enforcement provisions of section 309 and section 505 of the act, including injunctions, fines, and imprisonment. For some industries, there would be problems in financing because of disclosure requirements and bondable property addition requirements under their mortgages. Under the act, citizen suits may force EPA to act against these industries.

In order to carry forth the express intent of Congress to provide protection from suit to dischargers during this initial permitting process, and to preserve the financial integrity of our Nation's industry affected by the FWPCA, it is essential that EPA formally publish this legal opinion. In the Federal Register, and amend its regulations to indicate that EPA adopts the policy set forth in that opinion.

Mr. Speaker, I include the legal opinion and Mr. Kirk's letter of July 23, 1974, at this point in the RECORD.

EPA LEGAL OPINION ON SECTION 402(k), FEDERAL WATER POLLUTION CONTROL ACT, AS AMENDED

Question: If a discharger has not been issued an NPDES permit by December 31, 1974, even though he has applied for one, can the discharger be found in violation of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act? (Transcript June 26, Page 149.)

Answer: Section 301(a) states that "except as in compliance with this section and sections 302, 306, 307, 318, 402, 404 of this Act, the discharge of any pollutant by any person shall be unlawful." Section 402(a) provides that where a discharger is in compliance with the applicable requirements of various sections of the Act, the Administrator may issue a permit for such discharge. Section 402(k) then provides that compliance with any such permit is deemed to be compliance. "for purposes of sections 309 and 505", with sections 301, 303, 306, 307, and 403. It further states that "until December 31, 1974, in any case where a permit for discharge has been applied for pursuant to this section, but final administrative disposition for such application has not been made, such discharge shall not be a violation of (1) section 301, 306, 402 of this Act. . . ."

It is becoming apparent that there will be a substantial number of permits which, even though sources have filed applications, will not be issued by the end of this year. Sources are naturally concerned as to the impact of the "expiration" of this provision providing them "immunity" from suit. EPA has stated that where a permit is being processed, it will not, pursuant to section 309, take any enforcement action merely because a source is discharging without a permit. However, this does not prevent the filing of a section 505 citizen suit against the discharger. The question, then, is whether the sources are in serious danger of having a judgment rendered against them for violation of the Act. In our view, they are not.

Although the issue has not been often litigated and there is no clear precedent on the point, it can generally be expected that a court will not find a person in violation of a statutory provision where the violation occurs because of the inability of the individual to secure a license or permit from an administrative agency which would authorize that activity. Should a suit be brought in such circumstances, we expect that the court would either dismiss the action or stay the action pending completion of the administrative proceeding. In United States v. Pennsylvania Industrial Chemical Corp., 329 F. Supp. 1118 (W. D. Pa. 1971), a United States District Court held that a source could be prosecuted under the 1899 Rivers and Harbors Act (the Refuse Act) for discharging without a permit even though there was no administrative procedure set up for a discharger to secure a permit. The Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit reversed that decision, holding that, since a regulatory program which would have permitted the discharge had not been established by the Secretary of the Army, the discharger could not be held in violation for failure to comply with the nonexistent regulatory program. 461 F.2d 468 (3rd Cir. 1972). That decision was consistent with an earlier United States Supreme Court holding that an "applicant, who has done everything on his part required by the law, cannot be regarded as violating the law if, without the formality of a license wrongfully withheld from him, he pursues the business of his calling, which is not unlawful itself. . . ." Royal v. Virginia, 116 U.S. 502, 583 (1886).

The United States Supreme Court reversed the Third Circuit decision, but in doing so it indicated that its reasoning was based on the fact that the Refuse Act did not require the establishment of a formal regulatory permit program. 411 U.S. 655, 662; 93 S.Ct. 1804, 1811 (1973). The FWPCA does in fact establish a regulatory program in section 402, which would sanction the otherwise unlawful discharge and it is thus arguable that the Supreme Court would not reach a similar decision regarding a violation of the FWPCA where the regulatory program was being implemented and the failure of the discharger to comply with the Act was due to the failure of the regulatory program to be fully implemented. See also State v. Gisch, 150 N.W. 37 (1914). It is therefore our opinion that the present state of the law is that, if a discharger has submitted a timely application for a permit, a court would not find a discharger in violation of the Act even after December 31, 1974, for failing to have a permit when the administering agency had failed to take action on the permit application. One result, of course, might be an order directing the administrative agency to issue the permit.

fact that the Refuse Act did not require the establishment of a formal regulatory permit program. 411 U.S. 655, 662; 93 S.Ct. 1804, 1811 (1973). The FWPCA does in fact establish a regulatory program in section 402, which would sanction the otherwise unlawful discharge and it is thus arguable that the Supreme Court would not reach a similar decision regarding a violation of the FWPCA where the regulatory program was being implemented and the failure of the discharger to comply with the Act was due to the failure of the regulatory program to be fully implemented. See also State v. Gisch, 150 N.W. 37 (1914). It is therefore our opinion that the present state of the law is that, if a discharger has submitted a timely application for a permit, a court would not find a discharger in violation of the Act even after December 31, 1974, for failing to have a permit when the administering agency had failed to take action on the permit application. One result, of course, might be an order directing the administrative agency to issue the permit.

That being the applicable principle of the law, how is it affected by section 402(k)? While that section is generally viewed as identifying the time by which the Agency is to have all permits issued, it is obviously not a mandatory deadline imposed upon the Administrator. First, the language itself clearly does not impose any such obligation. Second, there was a provision in the Senate Bill which did impose time restrictions on the Agency but this was not enacted in the final version. Moreover, if that were the purpose of the section it is inconsistent to place the burden on the applicant rather than on the issuing authority. Unfortunately, however, there is no legislative history which explains in fact what the exact purpose or impact of this section is.

We view section 402(k) as merely being a recognition by Congress of the general principle of law discussed above and an effort to avoid unnecessary litigation by emphasizing it in the statute. The addition of the date presumably indicates when Congress expected (an expectation which was overly optimistic) the task of issuing permits to be concluded but should not, in our view, be interpreted to indicate a Congressional intent that the state of the law change after December 31, 1974, and a discharger be vulnerable to a suit for violation of the Act when it is operating under circumstances no different from those which, from October 18, 1972 to December 31, 1974, were not considered to be a violation of the Act. One would certainly expect such a substantial legislative action to be accompanied by a more explicit statement both in the Act and the legislative history. We therefore interpret the section not to create a change in the legal status of dischargers, and subsequent to that date a discharger still should not be considered in violation of the Act while his application is pending for a permit to perform the action, which would otherwise be a violation.

We recognize that this is an interpretation of rather sparse and confused case law and an ambiguous section of the statute. However, it is a reasonable conclusion to which we expect a court would be receptive. There are additional arguments which presumably can be made. For example, section 301 requires that a discharger comply with section 402; it is arguable that the discharger is in compliance with that section, as it has been implemented by EPA, through his applying, pursuant to EPA regulations, for a permit and following through on the permit issuance process. Under such a theory, the source would not be in violation of the Act and thus not subject to suit under sections 309 or 505. We do believe, however, that the analysis set forth above is sufficient to indicate that it is highly improbable that the "expiration" of this "immunity clause" will in fact result in a source being judicially found to be in violation of the FWPCA. For these reasons, we do not believe that any statutory change is necessary.

Mr. Gordon E. Wood,
Assistant Minority Counsel, House Public Works Committee, Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. WOOD: Following the discussion last week at the Oversight Hearings, we have again reviewed the question of whether dischargers can be successfully sued by citizens after December 31, 1974, where a permit has been applied for but not issued. We continue to believe, as outlined in the legal analysis previously supplied to the Committee (copy attached), that such a suit would not succeed. We recognize, of course, that the point is not at all clear and that arguments can be made on either side. For that reason, we have also stated that in the event of such a citizen suit, we would expedite processing of the permit involved, so that the discharger would not continue to face penalties as a result of our delay. The problem is not an easy one; we would welcome the opportunity for any further discussion you may wish.

Sincerely yours,
ALAN G. KIRK III,
Assistant Administrator for Enforcement and General Counsel (33-329).

MASSACHUSETTS DIVISION OF EMPLOYMENT SECURITY REVIEW BY HERALD-AMERICAN

HON. MICHAEL HARRINGTON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, recently at my request the General Accounting Office completed and released an audit of the Massachusetts Division of Employment Security.

This led, in turn, to considerable attention at the State level to the failures and successes of the agency; on the failure side, for example, ranking 51st out of 50 States and the District of Columbia in terms of job openings actually filled.

Most recently, in this regard, Joe Heaney and Ed Corsetti of the Boston Herald-American have written a three-part series on the placement agency. This review, although containing a few ambiguities with regard to the original of my study and the ignorance of people of the State level in that regard, deserves the attention not only of people in Massachusetts but of all Members of this body.

The placement program was originally established by Congress, and given the degree of its failure, not only in Massachusetts but in other States, Congress should undertake a whole review of this program and related programs in the next Congress as unemployment continues to mount.

The text of the articles follows:

JOB-FINDING AGENCY, CALLED INEPT, LOSES $100,000 EACH MONTH

Depending on whom you talk to, the Massachusetts Division of Employment Security (DES) is:

The kind of agency that will send "some character with long hair and no shoes to apply for a job as a bank teller."

An underfunded and understaffed division that has "minimized the ripoff" of fraudulent unemployment benefits in a state with the third highest unemployment rate in the nation.

A sprawling 2,610-employee agency with three directors in four years . . . declining and ignored for the last decade and now hobbled by inefficiency and patronage.

A department subject to the dictates of shifting federal priorities that have favored the disadvantaged.

An agency that has turned the corner on ineptness and low morale and is on the road back to productivity despite indifference and sagging confidence from the business community that supports it.

A federally-funded (Department of Labor) job placement and unemployment benefit agency, DES is administered through the state office of Manpower Affairs Secretary Mrs. Mary Newman.

DES has a two-fold purpose. Finding jobs for people and people for jobs; and providing financial benefits for qualifying unemployed workers. There are 42 local employment service offices in the six districts of the Commonwealth.

The State currently has the third highest unemployment rate in the country (8.4 percent), accounting for 189,000 unemployed workers.

Massachusetts also has one of the most liberal unemployment benefit laws in the nation.

To qualify, a worker must have at least $1,200 in earnings during the previous year. Depending on what the salary was, individual benefits range from a maximum of $95 weekly to a minimum of $14. In addition there are dependent payments of $6 weekly to a maximum of $48.

The maximum individual and dependent weekly benefit is $143 weekly for a total of 39 weeks before a $1,200 earning base must be reestablished.

The state's current claim load numbers more than 160,000 and dispenses $7 million in weekly benefit checks.

Morton E. Morin, who heads the agency's claims investigation section, says there are "at least $100,000 a month in overpayments (illegal claims)."

"Some people abuse the system . . . it's like anything else," says Morin. "But all told, only two percent of our claims are fraudulent."

Still, there are dozens of angles.

"The most common one, of course," says Morin, "is working and collecting benefits from an employer who pays under the table as a sort of fringe benefit so the employee can keep collecting."

"Then, you've got people collecting who are also on workmen's compensation, and people collecting for dependents they don't have."

"Six hundred suspected fraud claim cases have been turned over to the attorney general's office," says Morin. "They involve about half a million dollars over a five-year period."

Some of the unemployed prefer collecting unemployment benefits to finding a steady job. Many times these are seasonal workers, who only intend to work part of the year anyway. They often regard unemployment benefits as a right . . . something they are entitled to collect, even though they do not intend to find work.

"You just can't screen everyone," says Morin, "but we have ways of catching up with them."

Mostly, the fraud is uncovered through anonymous tips.

There is the story of the girl friend who called DES after a fight with her boyfriend to report him for collecting benefit checks illegally. A few days later the couple made up and the woman called back to say that what she had reported previously was untrue.

"Divorcees report on their ex-husbands, too. Then, there are guys who sit around a bar all day and can't resist telling how smart they are by collecting illegally," said Morin. Mrs. Newman became the lone woman in Gov. Sargent's cabinet in July, 1971, and will be out of a job when the incoming Dukakis administration takes over next month.

"I just took one look at DES and found the department was a pile of sawdust," said Mrs. Newman, "and not very good sawdust, either."

"After I used the word 'soggy' to describe DES, I was really disliked by some people down there. They became Newman-haters, but that doesn't bother me."

"Basically, the boat needed to be rocked. That's all there was to it."

To do the rocking, Mrs. Newman called on Richard C. Gilliland, 38, who was deputy assistant to Lawrence W. Rogers, assistant director of the New England regional manpower office (Department of Labor).

Soon after his arrival in March of 1972, Gilliland added seven high-paying jobs to DES at a cost of more than $140,000 annually. Civil service was bypassed.

Career employees sent up a chorus of howls that were eventually heard in Washington and touched off a Federal investigation.

The result was a report by the Federal Accounting Office (GAO) that became a major issue in the Sargent-Dukakis battle for governor. The report said Massachusetts had the worst DES record in the nation for job placement.

Disgruntled career employees, who felt Gilliland was wrecking the division and their chances for advancement, had prevailed on Congressman Michael J. Harrington, D-Mass., to launch the DES probe . . . but the report went too far and reflected on their own competence.

Harrington fed the report to fellow-Democrat Dukakis and during a televised debate a few days before last month's election, Dukakis announced the results to a surprised Governor Sargent.

Dukakis also pledged a whole new ball game at DES if he was elected.

The report also took everyone else by surprise.

"I don't think Mike Harrington was part of any sinister plot to get anyone," said Mrs. Newman, "but we had no idea the report had been circulated to anyone else."

"It's fun to be fooled . . . but it's more fun to know. It would have been nice to know."

Gilliland, who last March became director of the challenging regional manpower office in Chicago, still defends his performance at DES here.

"Certain areas of expertise just didn't exist in that agency and it was structured so there wouldn't be any produced in the future," he explained recently.

"I believe in promoting from within whenever you can, but you can't always do it. That's why I had to bring in those people."

(The jobs: two deputy directors, an ombudsman, an assistant director, an equal employment officer, an executive assistant, a project director.)

Gilliland said he didn't "think the report was too bad. You have to look at the whole report. You can't pick out bits and pieces and make a judgment."

"A lot of progress has been made since the study was made. I think the agency is slowly regaining the faith of the business community."

"If I would have done anything different, it probably would have been to accelerate the effort to regain public confidence and widespread use of the agency again."

Mrs. Newman strenuously defends her appointment of Gilliland and denies he was "borrowed" from the regional manpower office here solely to prepare for the high paying Chicago job.

"I give you my word," she explained, "there is not a political appointment in the whole shebang (DES)."

"The GAO report was a byproduct of what had been happening at DES. We just were not giving a total service."

"You don't come into anything bureaucratic without bringing a few staff people. At the beginning there was a great deal of anger and rage. The changes went over like a skunk at a lawn party."

"But the division had just gone down hill. Herman LaMark (Gilliland's predecessor; appointed by former Gov. Volpe and serving from 1968 to 1972) had no background in employment security," Mrs. Newman continued.

"Public interest in the agency was a flat zero and there was no legislative concern. The agency had become an advocate for the disadvantaged, rather than referral."

"But you can't serve the disadvantaged if you can't serve business, because it is the businesses that create the job opportunities."

"I was criticized for bringing Dick Gilliland in, but what the hell? If the people doing the criticizing were doing such a good job for the last 30 years . . . why weren't things better."

"Look at Dick, now. He has taken on the toughest manpower job in the country out there in Chicago. I think that suggests he is no schnook."

VICTIM OF SHIFTING U.S. MANPOWER PRIORITIES

(By Joe Heaney and Ed Corsetti)

Governor-elect Michael J. Dukakis got a major campaign boost last October when a timely federal report found Massachusetts trailing the nation in finding jobs for its unemployed.

Officials at the state's long-troubled Division of Employment Security (DES) called the report exaggerated and inaccurate.

They said the U.S. General Accounting Office (GAO) findings failed to recognize some special Massachusetts problems . . . like an 8.4 percent unemployment ratio and limited job listings from employers.

DES Director John D. Crosier, who has held the Sargent-administration job only six months, argued that his agency has turned a corner on past inefficiencies and is making steady progress since the GAO report was made last year.

Here are some of the 49-page report's findings:

Little attempt is made to match an applicant to a job or a job opening to an applicant, even though in most cases there were a number of applicants available for each opening and a number of openings for each applicant.

DES files were found outdated and disorganized.

A majority of employers and applicants did not receive any referrals within two weeks after applying.

The placement rate for persons not receiving unemployment benefit checks was four times greater than for those receiving benefits.

Director Crosier is a Holden resident with an extensive background in private business. Responding to the GAO, he stressed DES has been the victim of shifting federal manpower priorities for the last decade . . . usually favoring the disadvantaged and unskilled, who are the hardest to employ.

"The new programs of the 60s have presented an immense administrative burden. Each new program usually meant changed priorities; staff adjustments; additional reports; new state and federal pressures; more meetings, conferences, etc."

At the same time, Crosier noted that "no Congressional hearings on employment service effectiveness have been held for many years and, according to project staff, no GAO evaluation has been performed within recent times."

The Massachusetts study was initiated by Congressman Michael J. Harrington, at the request of disgruntled DES employees who were trying to oust Crosier's predecessor, Richard C. Gilliland, currently director of the federal regional manpower office in Chicago.

Crosier, in defending the rehabilitation of the agency, stressed that in fiscal 1974 there were 104,755 placements.

Regarded by some as the director who can get DES going again, Crosier replied to GAO:

"Since I assumed the position of director on May 20, 1974, I have been concerned that we in the division do everything possible with our limited resources to match employers' and workers' needs."

"I believe the facts indicate we have already made substantial improvement toward recommendations of the GAO report." The report recommended:

That DES applicant files be purged of outdated information and be made current with accurate information.

Increase efforts to match applicants with available job openings and increase the number of applicant referrals to unfilled jobs. Be sure the referrals are timely.

Improve management activities by using employment-service representatives and local office personnel.

Consider specialization of local office personnel in specific occupational areas and require this personnel to work closely with employers to promptly fill job orders.

Improve management efforts to place persons receiving unemployment insurance benefits.

The report contained a case study of seasonal employment at the Internal Revenue Service Center in Andover that showed the availability of unemployment benefits can create a disincentive for experienced seasonal workers to seek work.

"The high benefits being paid in Massachusetts, compared to other states, further complicate the situation," the report said, adding:

"In cases such as those identified in the IRS case study, substantial benefits may be obtained by unemployed seasonal federal workers, and these benefits hamper DES' ability to place these workers in alternative jobs."

"We believe this situation may be indicative of a much broader problem and intend to review the matter further."

Director Crosier concedes that morale is a problem among DES employees.

"In certain local offices, the physical environment is not conducive to good morale," he explained.

"Certain working conditions are unacceptable and need to be addressed. You've got people trying to be public servants who shouldn't be treated like public slaves."

"There are World War II desks in offices that are cold, uncomfortable and not very professional." (Crosier cited DES offices in Waltham and Northampton as ones that could be improved.)

The director explained that there are DES jobs paying less than comparable positions in other state employment "and we hope to correct these shortcomings through reclassification."

Crosier's attitude toward promotion will endear him to employees who feel they were passed over by his predecessor, Richard Gilliland.

"All promotions will be from within unless there is a specialty we don't have inhouse. All jobs will be posted and there will be open examinations."

"I want to create an environment that is not luxurious, but adequate and a pay scale that is compatible with local conditions and one that provides for upward mobility."

December 20, 1974

"I would have an organizational structure," Crosier continued, "that would permit decisions to be made at the lowest level where the information is available."

Crosier said he intends to apply sound, proven business techniques to all areas of DES "and then operate on management by exception. That means I don't intend to hear about anything unless there are problems."

The director said that among his most difficult tasks is to regain the confidence of the business community.

"Because of the quality of the referrals, employers have been reluctant to list their better jobs with us. Frequently the job openings have gone to private employment agencies."

"We have been dealing with fewer than 20 percent of the openings in the economy. And without the jobs there can be no placements."

To gain a wider share of the state's job openings, Crosier has been journeying throughout the state explaining to business gatherings the advantages of a reorganized DES.

Crosier says his biggest complaint with the GAO report is that "it completely failed to address external factors."

"Things like national directives insisting that minorities and disadvantaged get the job breaks; economic conditions in the state and the improvements we have made."

LAMARK DEFENDS TENURE AS DES DIRECTOR

(By Joe Heaney and Ed Corsetti)

Herman V. Lamark, a Volpe administration memory, refuses to be the fall guy for any of the proclaimed deficiencies at the stormy Massachusetts Department of Employment Security.

The former DES director (1968-72) has had a series of critical fingers pointed at him since a federal General Accounting Office report surfaced last month blaming Massachusetts DES for the worst job-placement record in the nation.

Lamark not only defends his tenure as one of the most productive and difficult in DES history, he says he is willing to counsel Governor-elect Michael J. Dukakis on DES policy without returning to the agency.

"It is essential that the business community be educated to the idea that DES does have qualified people to place in jobs," says Lamark.

"We must tear down the image that only derelicts and bums are available for jobs at DES. Businessmen in and out of the state must be convinced there is an adequate labor force in Massachusetts."

Lamark is currently on the staff of Lowell Technical Institute as director of development and job placement.

The former DES official established the Professional Center on Route 128 for the scores of unemployed engineers produced by the space and defense cutback of the late '60s.

Lamark says that under his administration state unemployment hit 8.1 percent, but was cut back to 6 percent. He said his techniques and policies have been adopted by DES officials in 21 other states.

The former director said he is now assisting DES Director John D. Crosier in trying to find jobs for 10,000 unemployed Massachusetts teachers.

Outgoing Secretary of Manpower Affairs, Mrs. Mary B. Newman, has been critical of Lamark. And so has Lawrence W. Rogers, assistant director for the New England Regional Manpower Office.

"The division began its decline in late 1968 when unemployment started going up," Rogers recalls.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

"There was trouble getting information out of that agency. They didn't know how many people they had employed or how much money they had spent."

"It was bad administration," says Rogers, "money was badly handled and at the end of the fiscal year they didn't know where the reports were."

Rogers said the agency has improved "but DES in the rest of the country has improved much faster."

He said he agreed with most of the GAO report that was almost entirely critical of DES.

"The accuracy is there," he said of the report, "but there is a question of scope." All in all, said Rogers: "I would give the report an A minus."

Lamark charges that "the DES decline began with Mary Newman."

"She immediately doled out jobs to political hacks, campaign workers, etc., until civil service was practically nonexistent as far as top jobs went. The unfortunate thing is that all of the appointments were for key jobs."

Lamark says Rogers was opposed to some of his best ideas and cool to the plan for a Professional Center to place unemployed engineers.

Thomas L. McGrath, director of research and development for the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce, believes the Route 128 Professional Center was a big plus for DES.

"In 1970-71 there were about 10,000 engineers and technical people out of work. That figure has shrunk to about 3,800, which means 6,200 must have been aided in some way."

Still, says McGrath, "DES for the last 10 years has had a poor reputation for producing candidates for employers who place jobs with them."

"Some of the jobs listed have been pretty bad," he conceded, "like working in a Brockton factory for $1.55 an hour."

And part of the DES problem has been "the unusually high number of unemployed in Massachusetts . . . 8.4 percent, about two percent above the national average."

"If the economy can't generate jobs, is it DES's fault?"

McGrath said DES is currently conducting a campaign to regain the confidence of the business community and the Chamber is co-operating.

"Unless the employer has confidence in DES, he isn't going to play ball. Businessmen tend to endorse those things operating with some degree of efficiency, or it's hands off."

"The last thing they want is a bad experience."

Raytheon, one of the state's largest employers, has these opinions of DES:

"Our experience with the DES has been very good in some instances and not so good in others. Cooperation and performance of the division were outstanding in our opinion with respect to the Route 128 Professional Center."

"On the other hand, Raytheon employees who interface with the division feel computer-output problems and a shortage of trained personnel have caused claims-service activities not to be quite as effective as in previous years."

"And some of our recruiting people say they are not able to get as many qualified people referred by the division as they would like to see."

In Lynn, General Electric Co., says the local DES office "has been cooperative and offered a satisfactory performance."

Regardless of what anyone says about DES, the agency's most powerful critic today is Governor-elect Dukakis.

He said he was "dismayed" to read the GAO report placing the state last in job placement.

"That record would be distressing even if we had a low unemployment rate. But it is particularly distressing in light of the fact that Massachusetts has the worst unemployment rate of any industrial state."

Dukakis called the placement problem "very serious," adding:

"Beginning in January, turning that record around is among our first priorities. We can do it and we must. No state government can tolerate a dismal job placement record."

The incoming governor breaks the problems down this way:

1. DES is finding jobs for an extremely small percentage of unemployed people.

2. Business and industry are notifying DES of only a small percentage of openings, most of which are low-paying.

3. As unemployment rises, increasing numbers of DES staff of people are taken from the placement section and told to help with the clerical task of paying unemployment compensation.

4. As a result, the unemployed do not expect help from DES; employers do not expect help from DES, and the morale and expectations of the unsuccessful overburdened and frustrated staff continue to sink lower.

Dukakis has these suggestions:

"Despite an economic turnaround, there are still good-paying jobs available and going unfilled. DES must ask industry to advise it of a wider range of openings."

"It must have a better profile of the unemployed so they may more effectively try to place them in appropriate jobs."

"The lack of coordination between our training program and the present and prospective needs of good-paying industries is another problem that must be solved."

"We must refine our methods of projecting employment needs so we can begin training people for jobs that will be there when they graduate. This can be done by getting information directly from business and making a combination of hiring and training agreements."

"To succeed in this training effort, I shall oversee the coordination which will be required between the Secretary of Economic Development and Manpower and the Secretary of Education."

"Underlying all of this will be the administration's high priority undertaking to end this state's economic slide," Dukakis said.

"It will not be easy, but in final analysis, we must do this if we are to provide jobs for our people."

DES employees are "dying for leadership, cooperation, understanding and good public relations," says Morton E. Morin, an 18-year veteran of the agency, who heads the claims investigation section and hopes to become an assistant director.

He lists these things as what the agency needs most:

"Leadership. Someone with an extensive knowledge of Massachusetts and its problems."

"A realistic budget and someone who will fight for our share. Our budget has been cut despite the rising unemployment rate."

"There must be greater understanding of the needs of the public, employers, employees and recipients."

Morin said DES also needs cooperation from the legislature, state agencies and other public and private groups.

"And we also need one helluva good public relations program."

Morin, who helped bring about the GAO investigation with a steady stream of criticism of former director Gilliland, calls the federal agency's final report:

"A piece of garbage that whitewashed the Department of Labor."

NELSON A. ROCKEFELLER

HON. DOMINICK V. DANIELS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 19, 1974

Mr. DOMINICK V. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, it is my intention today to vote to approve the selection of Nelson A. Rockefeller as Vice President of the United States. However, I do so with some reservation.

The House and Senate hearings on Mr. Rockefeller has utilized his own and his family's massive wealth to further his political ambitions. His political campaigns for Governor of New York and for the Presidency have to an unprecedented extent been financed from Rockefeller family coffers. Considering that his margin of victory in his last campaign was only 1 percent over former Justice Goldberg, and that Rockefeller wealth financed what can only be termed a scurrilous book about a decent man and a great American, it seems doubtful that Mr. Rockefeller would have won that election without the last minute infusion of family funds. Indeed, Mr. Rockefeller outspent Justice Goldberg by almost 7 to 1 with much of the Rockefeller funds coming into the campaign at the last minute.

Mr. Rockefeller's record also evidences mistaken judgment concerning loans and gifts to various officials.

It has been said that Mr. Rockefeller's gifts were innocent attempts to keep good men in government; that while other men in government were stealing, Mr. Rockefeller was giving money away to attract men of intelligence and talent. This argument simply misses the point.

The gift to Dr. William J. Ronan, chairman of the New York-New Jersey Port Authority of almost two-thirds of a million dollars is an example. Dr. Ronan was Mr. Rockefeller's personal choice for the chairmanship of the Port Authority and admittedly gave him two-thirds of a million dollars as a gift in order to make Dr. Ronan's unique talents available to the Port Authority.

First, Dr. Ronan's efforts, while talented are not so unique that they should be so deserving. There are others in New York and New Jersey who would just as ably perform the services Dr. Ronan has performed without so great a reward.

Second, I am disturbed that the Rockefeller family owns a considerable amount of port authority bonds. The port authority was created to serve the transportation needs of New Jersey and New York. One of the major issues facing the port authority has been whether it would take over the administration of mass transit facilities in and between New York and in New Jersey. For many years the port authority has fought tooth and nail against accepting responsibility for mass transit because it argued that it could not afford to do so. Yet it invested heavily in major construction projects such as the World Trade Center in New York which has a very tenuous connection with transportation problems.

In spite of the enormous profits of non-transportation investments, the port authority continues to drag its feet on mass transit in spite of the fact that the New York-New Jersey area is choking on auto fumes and paralyzed by traffic. We are faced with the specter of personal funds used to retain Dr. Ronan who coincidentally maintained a hard line antimass transit position which also protected Rockefeller investments. That policy is to the detriment of public transportation. I find the coincidence too great not to question whether Dr. Ronan himself believed he had some obligation to the Rockefellers even if Governor Rockefeller never expressed such an obligation.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Third, even if Dr. Ronan did not protect the bonds of the port authority as a favor to the Rockefellers, he was an employee of the State of New Jersey as well as New York. Yet, again, he was the recipient of the personal largess of the Governor of New York leaving New Jersey to suspect whether Dr. Ronan's allegiance was to both New York and New Jersey or exclusively to New York.

Even wholly agreeing with Mr. Rockefeller's contention that he merely desired to insure that good men would remain in government, the appearance remains that these men were to protect Mr. Rockefeller's personal interests in return for his patronage. Certainly they would feel a very human temptation to do so. Regardless of Mr. Rockefeller's motive, the inherent evil of his largess is its tendency to corrupt those who accept it, the appearance of corruption, and its effect on the public, which learning of it, might well assume that it was for favors granted and thus becomes distrustful of its public officials.

My reservations, Mr. Speaker, are not based therefore on any real evidence of any unlawful acts either by Mr. Rockefeller or the recipients of his patronage. Mr. Rockefeller has been subjected to intense scrutiny by two congressional committees neither of which has turned up any unlawful act. It is my conclusion, therefore, that he acted in good faith. My reservations are based on the misgiving that so much could not be given for so little in return. But we do not legislate on the basis of misgivings. We do not make important policy on the basis of intuition.

There has been no evidence that Mr. Rockefeller has intentionally tried to influence any individual for his personal gain or that of his family. My reservations are based rather on my belief that the gifts themselves regardless of good motives, are detrimental to public confidence in government.

No doubt a gift of $50,000, or $25,000 or even two-thirds of a million dollars does not have the same connotation to a man whose family fortune is greater than the total worth of many nations of the world. Nevertheless it must, in my opinion, have an effect on the decisions of the recipients of that largess. In addition, it causes otherwise legitimate actions by a recipient to appear to be unethical. Thus Dr. Ronan's staunch protection of Port Authority bonds may well be legitimate. But the Rockefeller gift casts a long shadow over his action and clouds the public's confidence in government.

Mr. Rockefeller's record as Governor of New York is one of accomplishment, of imagination and innovation. State government has for decades become moribund. Governor Rockefeller, with much intelligence, great energy and no small amount of grace and charm, has overcome the inertia which held his State government static and he has created an effective working government.

The creation of a State university system which is a model for other States to follow, the Metropolitan Transportation Authority, State revenue sharing, and an efficient highway system are products of his years in office. They make a record of achievement which hopefully will be prologue to achievements in national Government.

Mr. Rockefeller has shown, moreover, that he possesses an honest character. With no small amount of courage he subjected himself to the harshest of public scrutiny. He did not seek to hide what other men might have designed to cover up. He was honest and forthright in disclosing his and his family's wealth and at the same time stood fast not to breach the privacy of members of his family who had a right not to become involved in his personal desire to become Vice President. It was a thin line to tread between the right of the public to know and his family's personal right to privacy. In my opinion he managed well to accede to the requirements of both.

Mr. Rockefeller is a highly competent, imaginative man with great experience in government. He understands government and how it operates. Such men are rare and not to be lightly regarded.

In voting to approve his nomination, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish that my vote be interpreted in any way as approval of Mr. Rockefeller's gifts and that they may continue. I firmly believe that such gifts, regardless of good motive, would corrupt the allegiance to the public interest of those who enjoy Mr. Rockefeller's patronage.

ROCKEFELLER CONFIRMATION

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 19, 1974

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to give my reasoning behind my vote to confirm Nelson A. Rockefeller as Vice President.

Mr. Speaker, until an hour before the vote was taken, I was not certain which way I would vote. I had, and still do have, reservations about Mr. Rockefeller. Mr. Rockefeller's vast wealth and large investments could create serious conflicts of interest in the position of Vice President. His unwise, insensitive and perhaps unethical loans and gifts disturbed me. I was disappointed by his ambivalent statements on the Palestine Liberation Organization when questioned by the Judiciary Committee.

This latter concern was diminished by a letter which my colleague from New York (Mr. Koch) received from the Vice President designate clarifying his position on the PLO.

As to possible conflicts of interests, the sensitivity to this issue which he and the other members of his family displayed during the hearings persuaded me that our new Vice President will be exceptionally careful to be above reproach in this area.

December 20, 1974

Mr. Rockefeller's executive experience as Governor of New York and his business world background will be a valuable asset to the administration in dealing with our ailing economy.

Although Mr. Rockefeller would not have been my choice for Vice President, I believe it was imperative that the office be filled without further delay. Further, under the provisions of the 25th amendment, there was no legal reason to refuse President Ford the mechanism provided by that amendment.

We are now in what I believe is the unfortunate position of having both a nonelected President and Vice President. I hope that I can join in an effort by the 94th Congress to modify the 25th amendment so as to remove the possibility of this situation arising again.

THE OZONE LAYER—PART 4, CONTROLLING FREON RELEASE

HON. LES ASPIN

OF WISCONSIN

Thursday, December 19, 1974

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing along with 13 cosponsors, a bill to regulate the production of freon—chlorofluoromethane.

Members will, by now, be aware of the possibility that the ozone layer, which protects us from the deadly force of the Sun's radiation, may be weakened by the release of freon into the atmosphere.

Scientific knowledge of stratospheric chemistry, upon which the warnings about freon's dangers rest, remains sketchy. Right now we lack the knowledge which would allow us to decide how much freon release is safe. But, if some scientists' predictions are correct, we also lack the leisure which would allow action to wait for perfect knowledge.

We must learn more; and it is to be hoped that the agencies responsible for funding scientific research will have money available for this high-priority problem. But while we learn, we must prepare to act.

The bill introduced today would provide for a two-step decision regarding freon production: An EPA determination of how much additional ultraviolet radiation the ecosystem can stand, and a NASA determination of how much freon can be produced each year without causing more than that amount of additional ultraviolet radiation to reach the surface.

The result of these two determinations would be an upper limit to the allowable annual freon production. This limit, once determined, would not be set in concrete, but subject to variation as our knowledge of the physics, chemistry, and biology involved improves.

H.R.—

A bill to protect the public health, safety, and welfare and the natural environment by regulating the production and importation of chlorofluoromethane.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress finds that—

(1) discharge of chlorofluoromethane into the ambient air threatens to reduce the concentration of ozone in the stratosphere;

(2) ozone reduction will lead to increased incidence of solar ultraviolet radiation at the surface of the earth;

(3) increased incident of solar ultraviolet radiation may cause increased rates of disease in humans (including increased rates of skin cancer), threaten important food crops, and otherwise damage the natural environment; and

(4) the release of chlorofluoromethane may pose a danger to the public health, safety, and welfare and requires prompt study and regulatory authority.

Sec. 2. For purposes of this Act—

(1) the term "chlorofluoromethane" means the chemical compounds, CFC₁ and CFC₂;

(2) the term "ozone concentration" means the mean concentration of ozone (O₃) in the stratosphere over the United States;

(3) the term "ozone reduction" means reduction in ozone concentration;

(4) the term "ozone reduction due to chlorofluoromethane" means ozone reduction caused by chlorofluoromethane manufactured or released in the United States;

(5) the term "steady-state ozone reduction due to chlorofluoromethane" means the ozone reduction due to chlorofluoromethane which would result from any given annual rate of chlorofluoromethane release if that rate were continued indefinitely;

(6) the term "target level" means the maximum steady-state ozone reduction due to chlorofluoromethane found to be consistent with the public health, safety, and welfare, pursuant to section 4; and

(7) the term "control level" means the maximum annual rate of chlorofluoromethane release found to be consistent with the target level, pursuant to section 5.

Sec. 3. (a) Effective beginning fifteen months after the date of the enactment of this Act, it shall be unlawful for any person to manufacture or import chlorofluoromethane, except under a license issued pursuant to section 6.

(b) Any person who manufactures or imports chlorofluoromethane in violation of subsection (a) shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned for not more than six months, or both, for each day of violation.

(c) The Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency may apply to any United States District Court to obtain a temporary restraining order, an injunction, and other appropriate equitable relief from any violation of subsection (a).

Sec. 4. (a) The Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency shall have the power, after public hearing and consultation with appropriate Federal agencies and scientific entities, to make rules prescribing the maximum steady-state ozone reduction due to chlorofluoromethane which is consistent with protection of the public health, safety, and welfare.

(b) Until the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency has exercised his rulemaking power under subsection (a), the target level shall be one percent.

Sec. 5. (a) Within twelve months of the date of the enactment of this Act, the Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration shall report to the Congress and to the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency his best estimate, based on the evidence then available, of the maximum annual rate of chlorofluoromethane release consistent with the target level.

(b) Within three months of any change in the target level pursuant to section 4, the Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration shall report to the Congress and to the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency his best estimate, based on the evidence then available, of the maximum annual rate of chlorofluoromethane release consistent with the revised target level.

(c) At any time after an initial report is made pursuant to subsection (a) or (b), the Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration shall have the power to amend such report if, in his judgment, additional evidence warrants a revision of his previous estimate.

Sec. 6. (a) Within two months after receiving the initial report of the Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration pursuant to section 5, and every twelve months thereafter, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency shall arrange for the issue by sale, at public auction, of licenses to manufacture or import a quantity of chlorofluoromethane equivalent to the control level thereby established.

(b) Such licenses shall be valid for a period of five years from the date of sale, and shall be transferable.

ECONOMIC CRISIS: A POINT OF VIEW

HON. HENRY HELSTOSKI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. HELSTOSKI. Mr. Speaker, virtually every American is well acquainted with the problems of inflation, and in some way we all have personally experienced the effects of sharply rising prices. Yet the factors behind inflation and the state of the economy are extremely complex, and only through careful analysis of these factors will we be able to solve this problem.

As a result, today I would like to take a few minutes to share with my colleagues some material which recently came to my attention. It is a paper entitled "Economic Crisis: A Point of View," and it was prepared by Howard Kaye of Teaneck, N.J. Throughout the years, Mr. Kaye has demonstrated a keen understanding of the variables and relationships which influence our economy and I believe my colleagues will find his arguments extremely perceptive and highly interesting. Mr. Kaye's remarks follow:

ECONOMIC CRISIS—A POINT OF VIEW

(By Howard Kaye)

While driving over the Triborough Bridge just the other day I thought to myself,

December 20, 1974

"Maybe this depression will get us another Public Works project as good as this one."

In order for one to focus on this economic crisis within the United States, one has to decide for himself what forces are at work that could have caused such a catastrophe to happen. After identifying these underlying causes, one should be able to develop a series of logical, consistent steps that could lead to economic solutions to economic problems.

I submit for consideration an identification of the problem, and some small, positive steps to lead us in the direction of coping. The economic system that brought such great power to the United States evolved in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in a land abundant with natural resources, a populace of rugged individualists and a new Industrial Revolution.

In such an environment it was only natural that Capitalism became the economic way of life. This Capitalism nurtured itself and was characterized by four separate but interwoven principles. The absence of any one of these would have made the system stagnant and, probably, self-destructive. The underlying strength of American Capitalism in its first stages were:

1. An open market.—In a people marked by their own drive for individuality it was imperative to have an economic system which allowed such people easy access to business proprietorship. And in a growing country, these people were unafraid to go anywhere in order to set up "shop."

2. Strong, efficient management class.—The combination of the geography, resources, open market and rugged individualism combined to develop a class of managers (on the premises managers) that was to become the backbone of great economic strength.

3. Profit motive.—In this period the drive of the management class was to make a profit from their business; to maintain one's family and his employees' well being.

4. Competition.—Competition was the check and balance of the system itself. Every system needs a safety lever to maintain its stability. If some entrepreneur would take advantage of any aspect of the marketplace there was always someone available and able to go into that business and compete for customers and profits. It was the consumers' protector and the motivation for maintaining strong, efficient management. In a competitive economic system the strong who survive service the market best.

By World War I the economic character of the United States had changed. All four of the principles upon which Capitalism had evolved and developed were dissipating; cracks were appearing in the underlying strength of the system. And so, the beginnings of the present economic crisis were at hand.

WHAT WAS HAPPENING?

1. The Open Market.—The open market, the opportunity to go into business was greatly reduced by the large amounts of money and technical know-how required. The industrial revolution had progressed at an ever-increasing rate. Small, on the premises management business was giving way to the new, inexact science of absentee management.

2. Management.—By World War I the strong, efficient management class was now involved in managing other people's businesses. As the United States became a stronger and more important political entity, Americas' industrial capacity became more involved in producing material for that political entity. The advent of World War I was the first huge demand on that productive capacity. In order to win that war production itself became more important than the management of that production. The American economy's efficient management class was awarded "cost plus" and "over run" guarantees, and a whole new attitude by the economy's management class was spawned. It developed geometrically through the period of World War 2 to the present so that we now have a most inefficient management class.

3. Profit motive.—By World War 1 the most rugged of the rugged individualists discovered economic power through the growth of their businesses. From that beginning evolved power for power's sake. Economic power reached into the field of politics and became the end in itself. Profits could come at one's discretion if one had enough power. And so there dawned, in this period, a new motive for management to achieve. And this contributed to the aforementioned lessening of efficiency of that management.

4. Competition.—By World War 1 large, powerful business entities had evolved in almost every segment of the industrial production sector of the economy. Industry after industry succumbed to the concentration of interlocking ownerships by banks and boards. And the effect of this concentration was to reduce competition. Congress passed legislation such as the Sherman Anti-Trust Act to deal with this problem, but despite certain actions, in the long run the legislation proved ineffective in maintaining the check and balance of the system itself. Concentration led to a lessening of competition.

This country was in economic trouble by World War 1, but the reality of the situation was shunted aside by the prosperity of War.

It proved to be a fool's paradise; deterioration set in by 1922 in the form of an agricultural depression and eventually complete collapse in the world-wide depression of 1929 to World War 2.

By the end of World War 2 the factors that spawned and nurtured the great American system were destroyed by the circumstances that caused its success.

At the end of World War 2 this country would have faced economic disaster again if there had not developed a new set of economic circumstances to artificially prop up the economic system.

These were:

1. Reconstruction of the war torn production capacity of the leading industrialized countries of the world.

2. An increasing population in the industrialized countries of the world.

3. Lack of competition from the other leading industrial powers of the world.

4. War.

Because World War 2 was fought in Europe and Asia the industrial productive capacity, the homes and transportation routes of all of the other industrial nations of the world were destroyed completely or badly damaged. The United States experienced no such destruction at all.

It was inevitable that the United States would supply the goods and equipment to fill the needs of all of these nations. This was temporary prosperity based on temporary markets.

Because there was little or no foreign competition for these orders efficient management of American companies was no factor in the American manufacturers receiving these orders and shipping goods all over the world.

The American balance of payments in these post-war years were all in the plus column. But the money to pay for these goods came from the United States in the form of Marshall Plan dollars.

At the same time countries were being rebuilt, populations were also being rebuilt. War ravaged peoples set about rebuilding their families and post World War 2 saw a tremendous world-wide population explosion, creating a floor for the world's economies.

And since 1941 this country has almost constantly been at war.

What historian in 1939 would have predicted that this country would be a principal combatant in 3 major wars in the Far East in the next 30 years?

But war has been a prop under the American economy—either a shooting war, or the threat of a shooting war—since World War 2.

In this past decade the world has evolved into a new stage, and the American economy has not kept pace.

The basic principles that have supported this economy since World War 2 have once again been chopped out from under us, and this depression is the direct result.

1. Reconstruction.—There is no longer any reconstruction of war torn countries. We've rebuilt them all.

2. Population.—By 1960 the major industrial countries of the world had rebuilt its family and social structures. By 1970 these countries were groping for zero population growth. Only the most underdeveloped countries were increasing their population at the rate experienced in the years immediately after World War 2.

3. Foreign Competition.—During the reconstruction period new management styles were developed in the countries that were either our allies or our enemies in World War 2. Their management became more efficient than American management in plants newer and more efficient than American plants and equipment.

A new competition for world markets developed after 1960. It was now the United States versus all of the other industrialized countries of the world, and there were many new countries joining the Industrial Revolution after 1960.

Markets went to those producers with the most efficiently produced goods.

The United States itself became the prime market for the competitors of its own producers. By 1970 the United States became a debtor nation.

4. War.—The time-tested bulwark sure to provide a resurgence of economic health—is death: war.

Surely the people of the United States are not seeking to solve this economic crisis at such a devastating price.

And they should let their elected representatives (Congressmen, Senators and the President) know it in no uncertain terms.

The obvious alternative to war, a political solution, is to find economic solutions to economic problems.

The executive and legislative branches of the government have the responsibility to determine these solutions.

There is general agreement among the people of the United States that the economic system best suited to the social environment and personality of this country is Capitalism. Let those with leadership responsibility strengthen the four basic principles upon which American capitalism is built and under which it has prospered.

1. Open Market.—The government must make it possible for many people to go into business.

And once there are new people in business, government, through its regulatory agencies, must oversee the market place to make certain that old, established companies do not use unfair business practices in order to eliminate these new entrepreneurs.

There are laws that have been passed by previous Congresses that make provisions for these things to happen. But the laws have not been implemented.

There has been a Small Business Administration that in the past decade has made it possible for certain new businesses to be established.

But the Small Business Administration has been racked with dissension and controvery, and is now, in effect, unable to operate.

Congress and the Executive must devise techniques and provide the wherewithal so that citizens of this country regain the "rugged individualism" psychology that drives people to perform way beyond their present capacity. There must be a national feeling that hard work and a willingness to gamble time and effort can be rewarded by personal achievement at a new higher level. Such a climate will breed a new generation of super-achievers, and, hopefully, contribute to a change in the negative work ethic so common in this country today.

2. Management.—The federal and state governments must set standards which reward good management. Because the federal and state and local governments expend such huge amounts of money they have a tremendous impact on the market place, and the caliber of the companies that exist in that market place.

All contracts awarded by these governments must be based on management's ability to perform in a competitive system. There can be no "cost plus," no "over run" rewards for management not able to project and then achieve those projections.

The federal government can no longer reward inefficient management by providing money not normally available from well managed banking institutions.

In another area of positive approach there can be government sponsored research and experimentation in new techniques and efficiencies in dealing with the ever advancing Industrial Revolution.

3. Profit motive.—The role of top management in business is to efficiently run its business, not the business of government. Although it has become common for businessmen to become highly placed, policy making cogs in the political wheel, it is not in the best interests of American capitalism for this to perpetuate itself.

As this practice continues our business community suffers because some of its most productive managers are removed from their area of expertise.

Our entire economy suffers because political power replaces economic efficiency. And the history of business management people in political policy making positions records that the people involved almost always come from the largest and most complex companies in the segment of the economy in which they operate. The result is that power then belongs to the largest, perpetuating less competition in the economy.

Power becomes an end in itself among businesses and men. It behooves the Executive branch of the government to be very careful about its appointments, and its proclivity for accumulating large numbers of businessmen of high management caliber.

Government will have less problems if the economic sector is well managed.

And economic entities will compete more efficiently with its international competition if its best people are managing on the premises.

In the Capitalistic system the only measure of a business enterprise is its ability to make a profit in a competitive market place.

4. Competition.—The role of government in this American capitalistic system is to maintain the existence of the very heart of capitalism: competition.

There are other functions of government that are all encompassing over the system that provide the mechanisms which allow the component parts of the system to function from day to day; such as creating currency. But in this crisis all branches of government must concern itself with the basic principle of providing competitive system.

There are laws available to the executive concerning concentration of economic power and absence of competition that can be enforced by that executive branch of the government.

There are standards and definitions concerning competition within industries and segments of industries that must be written into law by the legislative branch of the government.

There are cases in courts concerning concentration of economic power that have been in courts too long without decision and action. Courts hearing such major cases must work overtime in this emergency so that decisions may be reached and actions taken based on those decisions.

Because of the depth of this economic crisis several short term actions will be necessary, actions by both the legislative and executive branches of the government, actions to deal with the immediate results of the crisis.

1. To combat the rising cost of food, which has a devastating effect on the poor and contributes so much to the higher and higher cost of living, Congress should set limits and standards concerning the export of our agricultural production.

Instead of exporting our food production Congress can pass legislation that will, in essence, subsidize our industrial production industries on a temporary basis. This will allow our goods to be competitive with those produced in other industrial production countries.

It will be no more costly to the country than exporting food products, and probably a good deal less. We, as a nation, are paying for the exporting of our food supply twice: first, in the form of inflated domestic food prices and second, in the form of specific amounts of subsidy payments to producers of specific farm products such as sugar and beef cattle.

2. To provide incentive to numbers of unemployed youth, junior colleges and state colleges and Universities should be subsidized with federal funds. In this period of crisis it is essential that a maximum number of people be productively occupied.

3. This crisis will exert a terrible human toll in the form of unemployment. National pride and morale is inherent in personal achievement; people able to work must work. Congress will provide for public works projects similar to the building of the Triborough Bridge in New York City in the 1930's.

The most positive project of this nature could be the rebuilding of the slum sections of our largest cities. It would have the positive effect of putting people to work in many different skilled and unskilled jobs, and result in a positive social result by providing decent housing wherever achieved.

4. To stimulate the purchase of goods and services immediately Congress can pass an across the board tax cut; a tax cut just big enough so that millions of people will have $100 or $200 extra every six months with which to buy things. This might mean a tax cut divided into two separate steps, each providing a stimulus to the economy.

As the largest number of jobs are in the retail and service sectors of the economy this stimulus will save people from being laid off, and could even provide some new jobs.

5. Congress should accept the recent arms agreement negotiated between the United States and the U.S.S.R. limiting the stock piling of certain armaments. In the spirit of that agreement Congress should reduce the budget of the Defense Department to the same dollars appropriated in 1972.

There will be disagreement concerning such an action from people who will not be satisfied that this country has enough war power. There will be dislocation for certain companies and certain industries that depend upon defense budget money to sustain them. Such a new budget will, hopefully, prod Defense Department management to set higher standards of performance in its dealings with contractors. And to set new standards of performance within the Department itself.

6. Congress should look askance at any executive edict that encourages higher consumer prices as the incentive to management to produce, or find, more.

This contradictory incentive is indigenous to industries with no real competition, and is no solution to any phase of this economic crisis. It is instead a reward for a violation of a basic principle of the capitalistic system.

7. Wage and price controls may seem appealing as a way of halting inflation; especially to each of us in his, or her, role as a consumer.

But controls do no good in motivating efficient management, do not provide new competition, do not provide for an open market or do not encourage the profit motive. In the short term controls will have a negative effect on labor. In the longer term controls will destroy supply.

8. The energy problem, although it is contributing in a major way to the economic crisis, has become a political problem. Congress and the executive branch are devoting too much of their efforts to seeking solutions in non-economic terms.

Congress, as well as state governments, will have to look into the entire public utility concept as it has evolved in this country. The non-competitive nature of this segment of our economy may be contributing, by its very nature, to an inefficiency and subsequent higher cost of goods produced in all other sectors of the economy. Oil companies should be restricted to one segment of the total industry: either producers or refiners or marketers, not all three. This has been done in other industries such as meat via the Stockyards Act. Competition at each level, and the need to produce profit in its area of "specialization" will induce companies to find economic solutions to the energy problems.

Some, or even all, of these proposals may truly be painful. They may very well cause more temporary hardships to certain people and industries, but they will be no more painful than the economic crisis hardships all 200 million plus Americans are experiencing. The alternative to a little pain—is war.

Congress and the President have the opportunity to help the American people make a choice.

DECISION ON CONFIRMATION

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 19, 1974

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, the matter now pending before the House of Representatives—the confirmation of Nelson A. Rockefeller to be Vice President of the United States—raises a multitude of constitutional, political, and moral questions in my mind.

I have wrestled with these troubling questions. I have mulled over them. I have studied them thoroughly.

I have felt a special urgency in all this because of the profound implications of what we do here tonight. Hopefully our action on the confirmation, as evaluated by future historians, will prove to have been wise and proper and right.

Mr. Speaker, this is a particularly critical matter for the Congress. This is the first time in the history of our great Republic that the Congress has been called upon to confirm as Vice President a man who has been selected for the office by a President who himself was not elected by the people but, rather, who ascended to it by way of the congressional confirmation process established under the 25th amendment.

Our responsibilities in this situation are grave. We cannot afford to be wrong. And, it is this special sense of urgency—this need to be right—Mr. Speaker, which has made resolutions of the questions raised by this nomination all the more difficult for me.

One of the most fundamental, and most disquieting, of these questions is whether, in the discharge of my duties under the 25th amendment, I am acting purely as a surrogate or as a stand-in for the people I am privileged to represent in the Congress.

Some of my colleagues take the position that the procedure set forth by the 25th amendment for confirming a Vice President is one of those very rare instances where we as Members of Congress are not supposed to exercise our judgment.

These same colleagues hold that our role here is simply and solely to reflect the opinion of the electorate as that opinion can best be discerned and evaluated.

Admittedly, a vote on confirmation is somewhat different than a regular vote. This vote was meant by the architects of the 25th amendment to be a more representative vote than one usually casts in the Congress.

Usually we accept or reject a legislative measure on the basis of how well or poorly it coincides with our personal conviction, conscience, or political philosophy.

But, under the 25th amendment, we do not accept or reject the nominee on how well or poorly that person measures up against our own principles and standards.

The real question is whether the nominee has the requisite experience, the emotional stability, the intelligence, the stamina, the dedication, and the national/international stature to discharge the duties of Vice President now and, maybe, the duties of the Presidency later. In making these determinations, we must, of course, exercise some independent judgment.

However, even if we accept the fact that the drafters of the 25th amendment had in mind that a vote on confirmation was to be a purely stand-in vote for the constituents whom a Member represented, one might ask how the view of that constituency can be determined accurately?

Is this evaluation to be done by polling, by counting newsletter responses, by weighing the mail?

I am not satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that there exists a method of ascertaining the attitude of a constituency with unerring accuracy. Nothing short of the ballot box itself seems to offer a reliable and dependable measure of the sentiments of the people.

And even at the ballot box there are problems. Low voter turnout could distort the results. Furthermore, the views of our constituents expressed in an election might be very different than expected or predicted.

An election adds an important new element. The voters evaluate the nominee in comparison with an opponent. And, by this comparison a nominee might fare better or worse than when evaluated in a vacuum, so to speak, as is the situation in a confirmation proceeding where the nominee is measured against standards of fitness and competency which tend to be the ideal standard rather than the normal standards.

Furthermore, an election is a kind of crucible or pressure cooker. The applications of stress and heat to a candidate in an election will demonstrate one man's strength and resiliency but another's weakness and brittleness.

Who, therefore, can say with confidence that Mr. Rockefeller would not be selected Vice President by the people of this country in an election? I cannot.

Another item of real concern to me in arriving at my decision on Mr. Rockefeller, Mr. Speaker, is that the nominee and I disagree on many political issues. Premier among these is the question of abortion.

Yet, I recognize that a vote against this confirmation because of our differing political philosophies would frustrate the undeniable right of President Ford to have a person of his own choice and of compatible political viewpoint as his Vice President.

Reasonable men of good faith, intelligence, and high moral standards may disagree on issues. I accept this type of disagreement as a necessary and inescapable part of democratic government.

And, I do not believe that my disagreement with Mr. Rockefeller, on even so transcendent an issue as abortion, disqualifies him from receiving my vote on confirmation.

Also, Mr. Speaker, we cannot overlook the fact that people change physically as well as philosophically during life. Who is to say with absolute assurance that a "Vice President" Rockefeller—with a national constituency—will not have a different view on abortion than "Governor" Rockefeller—who had a much narrower constituency.

Mr. Speaker, I worried a lot about another matter involved here before reaching my decision on confirmation. It is the wedding—in the event of confirmation—of vast economic power and vast public-governmental power in one man.

Such a merger would produce conflicts of interest of such magnitude, goes the argument against his confirmation, that it would be humanly impossible for the nominee to objectively discharge his duties of office which include casting all tie-breaking votes in the United States Senate.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, former Governor Rockefeller's record of over 30 years of public service, examined in painstaking detail by the Judiciary Committee, reveals no documented examples where he used his political power to enhance his personal or his family's wealth.

Neither was the committee able to document a situation where he used his economic power to enhance or enlarge or strengthen his political power. It is largely conceded that Rockefeller's is a record of worthy public service over the years.

Additionally, Mr. Rockefeller has assured the committee, the Congress and the American people, that he will place his extensive financial holdings in a blind trust.

This is not a totally satisfactory situation. But, under the unique circumstances here obtaining, it indicates that he appreciates the potential for real and apparent conflicts of interest which exist in his economic wealth. And, it is clear that he wants to avoid such conflicts.

It must be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that Members of Congress do not have to place their holdings into blind trusts, even though some Members have extensive ownings. Nor, do Members have to make a full and complete financial disclosure of their possessions, something the former Governor has done willingly.

If Members of Congress are presumed to vote the merits or demerits of a measure before us, notwithstanding financial holdings, it would seem that the Vice President Designate is entitled to the same presumption. It must also be remembered that the long history of this Nation—from Washington, to Clay, to Franklin Roosevelt, to Kennedy—proves that men of great wealth can render high and distinguished public service in disregard of personal wealth and personal gain.

Although the extent of Mr. Rockefeller's wealth makes his an extreme and an unusual case, the principle is clear: wealth should not, in and of itself, bar one from entering public service nor from rendering service in the public interest.

One of the most difficult barriers for me to surmount in reaching this point in the confirmation proceedings is the nominee's record of making financial gifts, in large sums, to people occupying public office or occupying influential private positions.

At best these episodes bring Mr. Rockefeller's judgment into question. At worst they might amount to criminal acts. Though, it should be added here, that no one argues seriously that Rockefeller's gifts were intended to influence the recipients or were made in conscious violation of the law.

He has now, however, pledged never to make gifts—or to forgive loans—while Vice President. This does not make up for past errors and indiscretions, but it is a reasonably satisfactory way to solve the conflict between what one can do as a private person—make gifts to friends—and what one must refrain from doing as a public person—make gifts to friends.

Mr. Speaker, the upcoming vote on the Rockefeller nomination has been one of the more difficult votes I have confronted since coming to this distinguished body. I have devoted a lot of time and thought in preparing for this vote.

The American people are entitled to have this question disposed of without further delay provided the nominee possesses the essential qualifications for the office for which he has been nominated.

My study and my thought persuades me that Nelson A. Rockefeller is possessed of the essential qualifications for the office of Vice President of the United States. I have no other choice, Mr. Speaker, except to cast my vote tonight for confirmation.

H.R. 16994

HON. MARGARET M. HECKLER

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mrs. HECKLER. Mr. Speaker, it is most unfortunate that the 93d Congress did not enact H.R. 16994, which would have provided a tax incentive for people to put money into savings accounts. The first $500 of interest earned from savings accounts would have been excluded from the definition of taxable income.

Earlier in this session I introduced similar legislation, H.R. 16463, and I have argued strongly in favor of its passage. At one point, H.R. 16994 was scheduled for House action under the Suspense Calendar, but subsequently diverted to the Rules Committee, with the result that American taxpayers will not have the benefits of this income exclusion.

Indeed, the significance of this legislation goes far beyond the advantages to savers. My analysis of this proposal, done with the help of my very experienced consultant, Robert Pyle, who has long experience in banking and housing legislation, over the past few months, has resulted in the identification of a number of advantages that would attend this income exclusion. The net result would, in my judgment be a significant improvement in the housing finance sector, which is the key to solving the current depression in housing construction and sales.

The most immediate effect would be to improve the competitive position of savings banks in trying to lure the investment dollars. Disintermediation has severely depleted the loanable funds in savings banks. In Massachusetts, for example, the outflow from savings accounts into other investments has occurred at rates comparable to those in the 1930's. In August alone, the 167 mutual savings banks in Massachusetts lost $143 million in deposits.

This tremendous disintermediation has had a devastating effect on housing production, savings institutions cannot adequately finance new home building, which in turn has produced a 12 percent unemployment rate in the construction trades.

A second benefit of the tax exclusion would be to reduce the current liquidations of mortgage-backed securities by savings banks, which has caused major capital losses and thus reduced bank reserves. Although in Massachusetts savings banks have maintained unusually high cash reserves, and therefore have not had to liquidate as many of their securities as in other areas, nationally this has become a major problem, both for the savings institutions and the security markets.

I am aware that the U.S. Treasury has opposed this legislation, but I feel their position reflects a very narrowly drawn point of view. The $2 billion in Federal tax revenue which the Treasury claims will be "lost" is not lost at all. Its placement in savings accounts, and the multiple benefits derived from this inflow have never been adequately recognized by the Treasury.

By stimulating savings, the availability of mortgage funds is increased, and not through any stopgap measures such as Government-run tandem plans. Savings institutions could better fulfill their traditional role of providing financial support for housing. Construction unemployment would be reduced, thereby reducing the drain on federally sponsored unemployment compensation program. Housing finance would once again be undertaken primarily by the locally based thrift institutions, and would reduce the need for Federal programs, which in 1974 has accounted for 25 percent of all private borrowings in U.S. money markets.

It should be noted at this point that while deposits in savings accounts have increased in the late months of 1974, a significant portion of these funds are "Keough plan" deposits, which normally come at the end of the year. They will not be repeated in the next quarter.

Opponents to the savings interest exclusion have not proposed any workable alternatives, other than the two federally run tandem plans. Not only are these short-run measures, but the funds committed to the programs have come nowhere close to meeting the needs of housing.

I believe stronger initiatives are needed, such as the interest exclusion, and others. My assistant, Bob Pyle, and I have undertaken extensive discussions with experts in housing finance, to develop new proposals to lead us closer to an end to feast-or-famine cycles in housing. During the next session I will work for passage of measures that will truly address the housing depression in its full magnitude.

SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE,
EARL L. BUTZ

HON. VICTOR V. VEYSEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. VEYSEY. Mr. Speaker, throughout history those who have advocated change in public institutions and public policies have been subjected to severe criticism. More often than not, an immediate evaluation of their contribution and leadership is clouded by debate and controversy.

This is certainly the case with Secretary of Agriculture Earl L. Butz. When Secretary Butz joined the Cabinet in 1971, we were on the threshold of a tremendous upheaval in the agricultural-economic world. The scene was set for a dramatic change in U.S. farm policy as we responded to the demands of a newly awakened and hungry world.

For over 40 years, American agriculture had functioned under the protective umbrella of Government supervision concerning production, farm prices and income, and under strict limitations on production. Programs which were initiated during the dark days of the depression quickly became entrenched. Government programs have emphasized price supports which were designed to hold farm prices above free market levels, building of surpluses as farmers utilized science and technology to maximize production, and restrictions on acres planted.

Two conditions affecting the American farmer were noteworthy. First, an increasing share of the farmer's net income came from Government payments instead of the marketplace, and second, the costs to the consumer and the taxpayer had risen to high levels. For example, prior to 1960, direct Government payments to farmers rarely exceeded $1 billion, but since 1966, payments have exceeded $3 billion, with outlays reaching almost $4 billion in 1972. In other words, about 20 percent of net farm income in 1972 originated from Government payments as opposed to only 6 percent in 1960.

A series of devaluations of the dollar and a worldwide change in the demand for agricultural products as well as a siege of inclement weather were decisive factors as Secretary Butz assumed his duties in the Department of Agriculture in the fall of 1971. He quickly recognized a unique opportunity to remove Government controls from agriculture and return to an economy regulated by the law of supply and demand. In an agricultural market dominated by overproduction, the target price concept had been debated and rejected numerous times since it was proposed in 1949. However, now that national policy has shifted to all-out production in the face of the world food shortage, the target price concept has been adopted. As a result, payments to farmers have declined from a high of $4 billion in 1972 to $2.6 billion in 1973, and projections for 1974 indicate this down trend will continue. These reductions, of course, are due to higher market prices that exceed the level of target prices.

In the face of the world food crisis, this policy advocated by Secretary Butz is designed to maximize production. By combining all-out production with the concept of commodity target prices, not only can the farmer expand output but farm income is protected from severe drops in event production is excessive and commodity prices fall.

For many Americans the food supply chain begins and ends at the corner supermarket. There is precious little understanding of the complex factors that affect the supply and distribution of food. Also, in recent years, the primary concern of public policy has gradually shifted from the producer to the consumer, reflecting the growth of consumerism in the economy. In the face of his many critics who have reacted angrily to rising food prices, Secretary Butz has shown a resolute determination to pursue policies that will insure maximum and efficient use of America's agricultural capacity. He has indeed been a Secretary for Agriculture.

Secretary Earl Butz has demonstrated a keen understanding of the agricultural marketplace balanced with a concern for the welfare of the farm family and for an adequate supply of food for the consumer.

Food prices are indeed higher as a result of worldwide inflation, increased marketing costs, and the ever-increasing demand for American farm products to feed a hungry world. But American farm productivity is the envy of the world and this is possible because Secretary Butz has moved our farm economy to a free market basis.

TRIBUTE TO W. EUGENE AINSWORTH, JR., SPECIAL ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT

HON. TRENT LOTT

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 16, 1974

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, along life's journey one meets and gets to know only a few genuine friends. There are times when we all seek the refuge and counsel of a special friendship in which we have total confidence and trust. In my more than 6 years in Washington Gene Ainsworth has been my closest confidant and special friend. I take real pleasure in having this opportunity to express my gratitude for this relationship and for the outstanding service he has rendered the State of Mississippi and the country.

The list of adjectives that could be used to describe Gene's capabilities would be endless, but certainly his dedication to his tasks and his conviction of philosophy cannot go unmentioned. His 8 years of Government service as administrative assistant to Congressman G. V. Montgomery and as Special Assistant to the President have earned him the title "public servant." We are all better off because Gene was here.

I join his many other friends in wishing him continued successes in the private sector and look forward to working with him in the future for the betterment of our country.

NELSON ROCKEFELLER FOR VICE PRESIDENT

HON. JOHN N. ERLBORN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 19, 1974

Mr. ERLBORN. Mr. Speaker, during much of our Nation's life under the Constitution, we have agonized over what to do in the event of a vacancy in the Vice Presidency. We have experimented with a number of solutions, none of them satisfactory.

Seven years ago, the nation passed the 25th amendment. It is not the ideal solution to our problem, but it is the most agreeable answer we have found.

It requires the President to nominate a citizen who shall become the Vice President if confirmed by the two Houses of Congress. Soon after his succession to the Presidency, Gerald R. Ford nominated Nelson Rockefeller and we were called upon yesterday to accept or reject him.

Many persons opposed Mr. Rockefeller, but I doubt that they are a majority. First the Senate and then the House investigated him and no basis was found for rejecting him.

He has been in public life many years. He has been elected four times to the governorship of one of our great and diverse states. He has been a good and sincere citizen.

Mr. Speaker, I was prevented by illness from taking part in the debate and the decision to confirm Nelson Rockefeller as Vice President. My statement today is that I approve the House's confirmation. Had I been in attendance yesterday, I would have voted "yes."

THADDEUS J. DULSKI

HON. DOMINICK V. DANIELS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 18, 1974

Mr. DOMINICK V. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to add my voice to those who have already extolled the many virtues of my good friend and very distinguished colleague, and since 1967, the able chairman of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, THADDEUS J. DULSKI.

I have a special kinship with the chairman because we were elected to the Congress for the first time on the same day, November 4, 1958, and took the oath of office together for the first time at the bar of the House on January 3, 1959. Indeed had I been as thoughtful then as I might have been, and gotten myself appointed to the Post Office Committee, I would be the chairman today and might have been chairman as long as 8 years ago. Thinking ahead has always marked the character of THAD DULSKI. Careful and meticulous, he was a man who always had his ducks in a line. Under his excellent leadership the Federal civil service was vastly improved, and time will not permit me to list all of the good things that he accomplished within his sphere of legislative expertise.

Mr. Speaker, THAD DULSKI has been far more than an excellent chairman of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee. He has been an eloquent voice for the veteran, for the working men and women, and for those behind the Iron Curtain who would have no hope except for legislators like THAD who have not forgotten the cause of eastern European nationalities whose national identity has been suppressed by the Soviet Union. I know that in my own district a great many constituents of eastern and central European heritage have looked favorably upon me because they knew I was a close personal friend of THAD DULSKI.

Speaking for all my colleagues in New Jersey, I know that we all miss THAD DULSKI, but we are all the better for his 16 years of distinguished service.

BILL TIMMONS AND GENE AINSWORTH

HON. G. WILLIAM WHITEHURST

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 18, 1974

Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Speaker, the departure of Bill Timmons and Gene Ainsworth from the White House staff leaves me with mixed feelings. While I am pleased that both of these men will go on to new career achievement, I personally am going to miss their friendly cooperation in facilitating the periodic requests which I have had to make of the White House.

Bill and Gene have the reputation of being able to deliver, and they manifest the kind of personality which is particularly important for liaison work in that when someone calls them he is never made to feel that he is imposing.

Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to wish both of these gentlemen well and also to say that we will miss them during the 94th Congress.

THE FIRST CHRISTMAS CELEBRATION IN AMERICA

HON. DON FUQUA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker. It is with some justifiable pride that I lay claim to having the site of the first Christmas celebration in America in my congressional district.

On Sunday, December 22, the Apalache Spanish Heritage Association of Tallahassee, Fla., will re-enact that first American celebration of Christmas.

After the Spanish explorer, Hernando DeSoto, landed in the Tampa Bay area of Florida in 1539, he and his men made their way up the State of Florida, turning west in the area where the city of Live Oak is now located and traveled to the shores of Lake Jackson near Tallahassee to spend the winter of 1539-40.

Twelve priests accompanied DeSoto on that historic exploration.

Here on the outskirts of what is now the State Capital of Florida, they celebrated the first Christmas service in North America.

December 20, 1974

MAJOR LEGISLATIVE ACCOMPLISHMENTS FOR THE 1ST AND 2D SESSIONS OF THE 93D CONGRESS

HON. CARL ALBERT

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, the 93d Congress labored throughout its existence in a period of traumatic challenge to the Nation. The Congress began at the end of a war which was perhaps more divisive among our people than anything that had happened since the War Between the States. No sooner had it terminated than the Nation was confronted with an unprecedented crisis of confidence in Government followed by the worst fuel crisis in the history of Western civilization. This was followed by a drought in the Middle West and in many of the important agricultural areas of the world, which resulted in a simultaneous food and a fuel crisis. At the same time inflation was rapidly rising and recession was becoming more severe.

The House of Representatives and the Senate proved to the American people and to the world that our system of government is sound, that it is stable and that it is capable of performing well in a troublesome and even perilous context.

The 93d Congress squarely faced the basic constitutional issue of separation of powers by challenging the ever-increasing encroachment upon its prerogatives by the executive branch. This sets it apart from all other Congresses of modern history.

In my opinion, the 93d Congress would have been of historic significance had it done nothing more than enact two landmark statutes, the War Powers Act and the Budget and Impoundment Control Act. Both were accomplished through congressional initiative, without Presidential input, in open congressional hearings and in full public view. In the case of the War Powers Act, the initiative was carried to the point of overriding a Presidential veto.

The assertion of congressional prerogatives as it relates to war powers will be considered a first giant step on the long road back to the constitutional balance between the executive and legislative branches of the Federal Government contemplated by the Framers of the Constitution.

The Budget and Impoundment Control Act reaffirms the principle of congressional control of Government spending by equipping Congress with the tools and technology to devise its own policy statement so that the two branches of the Government, negotiating as equals, can work out effective courses of action for the benefit of the Nation.

The other problems with which this Congress has dealt are those which affect the lives of all of our citizens and of millions all over the world. We have strived to preserve the peace and to assure the present and future prosperity of our domestic economy and the viability of its relations with the rest of the world. We have passed bills designed to put people to work, to assist them when they are unemployed, to help them when they are sick and to assist them when they are elderly. We have passed measures to stimulate food production, protect the private pension rights of millions of Americans, develop new sources of domestic energy, reform rules governing campaign expenditures, increase support for elementary and secondary education, reform trade laws, and aid mass transit. We began to heal our economic troubles—a task which will be completed in the 94th Congress.

We have reaffirmed our form of constitutional government. We have demonstrated that the balance of powers still works and is still relevant to the solution of our problems. In meeting a continuing series of crises, we acted always in good faith, in the tradition of the Founding Fathers before us, and within the broad guidelines of constitutional government that they bequeathed to us.

The record of the 93d Congress is one of which every Member and every citizen of this Nation can be proud.

At this point in the RECORD I include a detailed summary of the many accomplishments of this historic Congress:

AGRICULTURE
Omnibus Farm Bill (P.L. 93-86, approved August 10, 1973)—In an effort to encourage food production and eliminate subsidies in times of high market prices, Congress amended the Agricultural Act of 1970 to approve a widely innovative four-year farm program guaranteeing farmers a "target-price" return on three basic crops (cotton, wheat, feed). If the market fails to pay those prices, government payments make up the difference, while "target-price" will be adjusted to reflect production cost increases during these years. The new system of price guarantees calculated on the basis of total production, is a significant change from previous years and gives broader protection than that of the old Agriculture Act. Under the new system, it is expected that the cost to the taxpayer of payments to farmers will be reduced and in some cases eliminated. Annual payment to individual farmers, for example, are limited by a ceiling of $20,000. In other areas the new Act extends the Food For Peace Program for four years; suspends the "bread tax" on domestic wheat that was passed on to the consumer; increases dairy price support to 80 percent of parity for two years, then drops it to 75 percent; and extends food stamps for four years while providing for semi-annual cost-of-living adjustments. Finally, a major new rural conservation program is authorized to succeed REAP including a pilot forestry incentives program.

Commodity Futures Trading Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-463, approved October 23, 1974)—Provisions of this legislation call for the replacement of the 38 year old Commodity Exchange Authority of the Agriculture Department with a new and more powerful five member regulatory commission. Membership will be full-time, appointed by the President, and approved by the Senate for staggered five year terms. The legislation which has been termed "the most sweeping overhaul of commodity market regulation in half a century," includes the following provisions: (1) authorizes the Commission to intercede in contract markets in order to restore orderly trading under emergency situations. Such situations have been defined as a market manipulation, either real or threatened, and any act of the United States or a foreign government which would affect the commodity, or any other major disturbance which would prevent the market from reflecting the forces of supply and demand with any degree of accuracy; (2) authorizes the Commission to assess fines of up to $100,000 for violations of the act; (3) directs the Commission to require the markets to submit daily trading reports if this is deemed necessary for an effective regulation of futures trading; (4) gives the Commission six months to decide whether to preserve dual trading—trading by a broker for his own account as well as for outside customers; (5) directs the Commission, in its issuance of orders and regulations, to take into consideration the public interest to be protected by the antitrust laws. The Commission is further directed to reach these goals by using "the least anticompetitive means and; (6) authorizes the Commission to define "bona fide" hedging practices.

Public Law 93-463 also breaks ground in another area as the Commission is directed to establish and maintain, as part of its operations, a research and information program to determine the feasibility of trading by computer and to study the application of other information systems technology to various aspects of the Commission's activities.

Emergency Loan Program (P.L. 93-24, approved April 20, 1973)—This year Congress helped the farmer faced with natural disaster by providing a modification and extension of the emergency rural loan program, which authorizes the Farmers Home Administration (FHA) five percent loans to farmers for loss of crops and other property due to natural causes. The measure provides for an 18-day extension under which rural residents might file with the FHA for the one-percent, $55,000 forgiveness loans available under the Hurricane Agnes program. Rural residents are eligible to obtain one-percent, $55,000 forgiveness disaster loans for loss only of dwellings and household contents between December 27, 1972 and April 20, 1973. Congress also established a new disaster relief program under which the Small Business Administration and the FHA may grant five-percent, no forgiveness loans to persons not able to obtain loans elsewhere.

Rural Electrification Act Amendments (P.L. 93-32, approved May 11, 1973)—Congress took action to assure the continuation of the low-cost loans made by the Rural Electrification Administration (REA) which had been terminated by the Nixon Administration in December, 1972. Congress approved legislation restructuring REA and converting the program into an insured and guaranteed loan program, permitting two percent loans for electric and telephone systems in sparsely populated areas, and creating a revolving fund with unlimited borrowing authority for making insured electric and telephone loans. Loans will be made from the large REA revolving fund, using the current assets of REA, estimated at more than $4 billion. The Administration had promised that REA would make loans each of the next three years at levels at least as high as those budgeted for fiscal 1974, which means a total REA loan level of $758 million, with at least $105 million for the two percent loans for sparsely populated areas.

Domestic Food Assistance Act (P.L. 93-347, approved July 18, 1974)—Under the Domestic Food Assistance Act, the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase agricultural commodities and their products necessary to maintain the level of assistance for food assistance programs was extended three years. These programs as are authorized by law serve needy families, institutions, disaster victims, summer camps, some Indian reservations and supplemental feeding programs for needy women, infants and children.

The law also specifies that Indian reservations are to continue receiving commodities instead of food stamps until June 30, 1977. The Federal government will pay 50 percent of all State administrative costs for the food stamp programs. In addition, minimum Federal reimbursements under the Federal school milk program were increased to five cents per half-pint of milk served. Annual adjustments were required in the reimbursement level to account for inflation.

Emergency Livestock Credit Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-357 approved July 25, 1974)—As a measure of relief for hard pressed livestock producers, who have been caught between fixed costs and falling prices almost all year, the Congress enacted a temporary emergency livestock financing program. As enacted, eighty percent of a loan may be guaranteed to bona fide farmers, up to $250,000 per borrower and $2 billion for the entire program. Guarantees are limited to bona fide farmers. Under terms of the law, "livestock" includes beef cattle, dairy cattle, swine, sheep, goats, chickens, and turkeys.

The Agriculture Department's authority to guarantee the loans will last for one year, but the program could be extended for another six months should the Department decide a continuation was necessary.

Egg Research and Consumer Information Act (P.L. 93-428, approved October 1, 1974)—This year Congress helped a flagging egg industry combat declining consumption and market uncertainties by allowing egg producers in the United States to establish and finance a program of research and promotion of their product. A report of the House Agriculture Committee, issued this session, revealed that egg consumption had dropped from 389 per person in 1950 to 292 in 1973.

Egg producers now have the opportunity to approve or reject the proposed research and promotion in a referendum. The Act establishes an Egg Board consisting of not more than eight members and composed of egg producers or representatives which will assess egg producers up to five cents per case of commercial eggs. This is estimated to amount to seven and a half million dollars a year. Egg producers have the option of requesting a refund if they do not desire to participate in the program. The egg program has been termed a form of "self-help legislation" by the House Agriculture Committee and government participation and expense are considered minimal.

Price Support for Milk (S. 4206 pocket vetoed by the President January 4, 1975). Both Houses sought to aid the dairy farmer faced with financial difficulty by voting in the Second Session to provide price support for milk at not less than 85 percent of the parity price through March 31, 1978 and by providing for a quarterly adjustment in the support level so that it would be maintained at this minimum level throughout the year. The price support level is now set on April 1 each year, and the present price support level was determined at 80 percent of parity on April 1, 1974. However, because of rapidly escalating production costs, the support level, in terms of prices received by farmers, has decreased, and is now estimated at around 75 percent of parity.

Extension of Certain Agricultural Programs to Guam (P.L. 93-421, approved September 19, 1974)—Since World War II, the Government of Guam has been trying to establish a substantial type of agriculture on the island so that the population could once again be relatively self-sufficient in food production. Although in 1964 the 88th Congress approved legislation which authorized the Department of Agriculture to establish and maintain agricultural programs in Guam similar to those administered in the continental United States, that authority expired in 1969—five years after the date of enactment. Approval of H.R. 13267 reinstates a portion of the earlier assistance by authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to assist the residents of Guam by providing financial and technical assistance for improving fire control, watershed protection and reforestation programs.

Noxious Weed Control (P.L. 93-829, approved January 3, 1975)—The House approved legislation in the First Session to fill a gap in the United States Government's statutory authority to prohibit and/or regulate the introduction of noxious weeds into this country. Such authority does not currently exist. This bill authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to issue quarantines and other regulations requiring the inspection of products and articles of any character and all means of conveyance in order to keep noxious weeds from entering the United States. It is hoped that this legislation will safeguard American crops against the more than one thousand four hundred types of weeds not found in this country which might, by their presence, add to the already enormous costs of weed control—estimated currently at five billion dollars per year. The estimated cost of this program should not exceed five hundred thousand dollars per year during the next six fiscal years.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Forest and Rangeland Renewable Resources Planning Act (P.L. 93-378, approved August 17, 1974)—Recognizing the need for long range planning both physical and fiscal for renewable resources, Congress approved legislation requiring the Secretary of Agriculture to prepare a Renewable Resource Assessment not later than December 31, 1975, and an updated report during 1979 and each tenth year thereafter. This assessment must include an analysis of the present and anticipated uses, the demand for and the supply of forest and related resources, with consideration for the international forest resource situation, and an analysis of pertinent supply and demand and price relationship trends. In addition the Secretary is required to make an inventory of present and potential forest and related resources and an evaluation of opportunities for improving their yield of tangible and intangible goods and services, together with estimates of investment costs and direct and indirect returns to the Federal Government.

Rural Electrification Guaranteed Loan Act (H.R. 12526 passed the House May 21, 1974)—This legislation amends the original Rural Electrification Act by making three important changes to expedite and simplify the guaranteed loan program of the REA. First, it exempts from registration with the Securities and Exchange Commission loans guaranteed by the REA. Second, it authorizes the assignment of REA guarantees with the approval of the Administrator. Third, it clarifies the REA Act provisions making the government guarantee incontestable except for fraud of which the holder has actual knowledge. It is estimated that $1 billion in loans will be guaranteed in fiscal year 1974.

CONSTITUTIONAL ISSUES

War Powers Resolution (P.L. 93-148, without approval November 7, 1973)—Congress reasserted its constitutional role in the war-making area by placing restraints on the authority of the President to commit U.S. forces to hostilities without congressional consent. Both Houses gave final approval to the War Powers Resolution, which requires consultation with Congress if at all possible in advance of any introduction of U.S. forces to hostilities, and a full report to Congress within 48 hours after taking such action. If Congress does not expressly authorize the commitment, the President must withdraw troops within 60 days (a 30 day extension is permitted if the safety of troops so requires). Anytime after the commitment of forces, the Congress could mandate immediate withdrawal through passage of a concurrent resolution—which is not subject to veto. In addition, the resolution stipulates that none of its provisions are to be construed as granting any authority to the President that he would not have had in the absence of the resolution. The power of the President to commit forces is defined to include only situations where Congress has declared war or provided other statutory authorization, or when a national emergency exists because of attack on the U.S. or its forces.

Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-344, approved July 12, 1974)—This Act constitutes a major effort by Congress to reassert control over its vital spending prerogative. Title I of the Act establishes Budget Committees in each House to report concurrent resolutions on the budget, recommending appropriate levels of total outlays and total budget authority, the recommended level of Federal revenues, the appropriate amount of budget surplus or deficit, and the amount by which the statutory debt limit should be increased or decreased. The totals for outlays and budget authority will also be broken down by functional categories. The purpose of the budget resolutions is to permit Congress to coordinate appropriations with revenues, instead of the present process of acting independently on separate appropriation bills without full knowledge of available receipts, the debt ceiling, and other factors. Moreover, the budget resolution will give Congress an opportunity to consider the budget in terms of overall priorities, choosing between the various programs that compete for available dollars.

Action on these budget resolutions will take place within the discipline of a new timetable. First, the fiscal year has been changed to begin on October 1 rather than July 1. This will provide additional time to complete the steps of the new congressional budget process. Also, the President will submit a "current services" budget on November 10 (more than two months in advance of his regular budget). In order to give Congress advance notice of the existing cost of budget services without policy changes, the regular budget will be transmitted by the President on or before the 15th day after Congress meets. By March 15 the Budget Committees are scheduled to receive reports from committees and joint committees, after which they shall report the first concurrent resolution on the budget by April 15. Congress shall complete action on that resolution by May 15, which is also the deadline for other committees to report all bills and resolutions authorizing new budget authority.

By the 7th day after Labor Day, Congress is to have completed action on all bills and resolutions authorizing new budget authority. A second concurrent resolution, taking into account congressional action up to that point, is subject to a September 15 deadline. Any disparities between the second concurrent resolution and any spending, revenue, and debt legislation are to be resolved by a reconciliation process to be completed by September 25. Professional assistance throughout this process will be available from a new joint congressional staff agency called the Congressional Budget Office.

Title X of the Act places new controls on the impoundment of funds. The language of the Antideficiency Act is tightened to permit budgetary reserves solely to provide for contingencies or to effect savings. Whenever the President determines that all or part of any budget authority will not be required to carry out the full objectives or scope of programs, or that such budget authority should be rescinded for fiscal policy or other reasons, including the termination of authorized projects, or whenever all or part of budget authority provided for only one fiscal year (one-year money) is to be reserved from obligation, he shall transmit a special message requiring a rescission of budget authority. Unless both Houses complete action on a rescission bill within 45 days, the budget authority shall be made available for obligation.

A second type of special message concerns deferrals. This category includes any delay in obligating budget authority, or any other type of Executive action or inaction which effectively precludes the obligation or expenditure of budget authority. The President will be required to make the budget authority available if either House of Congress passes an "impoundment resolution" disapproving such proposed deferral.

Ford Confirmation as Vice President—On December 6, 1973, by a vote of 387 to 35, the House of Representatives confirmed Gerald R. Ford as the fortieth Vice President of the United States. Mr. Ford was the first person ever to be confirmed by the House of Representatives and the first person to be confirmed by either House under provisions of the 25th Amendment. Adopted in 1967, section 2 of the 25th Amendment provides that "whenever there is a vacancy in the office of the Vice President, the President shall nominate a Vice President who shall take office upon confirmation by a majority vote of both Houses of Congress." The Senate approved the nomination on November 27, 1973 by a vote of 92 to 3. The Office of Vice President became vacant on October 10, 1973 when Spiro Agnew submitted his resignation.

Presidential Impeachment (H. Res. 803, approved February 6, 1974)—For the first time since the administration of Andrew Johnson, and the second time in the history of the Republic, the House, on February 6, 1974, adopted by a vote of 410-4 a resolution authorizing and directing the Committee on the Judiciary "to investigate fully and completely whether sufficient grounds exist for the House of Representatives to exercise its constitutional power to impeach Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States of America" and to report "such resolutions, articles of impeachment, or other recommendations as it deems proper."

Efforts on the impeachment question had begun in the autumn of 1973 in response to the first resolutions offered on impeaching the Chief Executive. On November 15, 1973, the House adopted H. Res. 702 by a vote of 367-51 providing $1 million for the Judiciary Committee staff investigation into the existence of grounds for presidential impeachment. An additional $733,750 was provided for the Committee's inquiry with the adoption of H. Res. 1027 on April 29.

On May 9 the Judiciary Committee was convened to review the results of the impeachment inquiry staff's investigation. On June 21 the inquiry staff concluded its initial presentation and on June 25 the Committee voted to make the initial presentation finding public together with substantially all of the supporting material assembled by the staff. The President's response, presented on June 27 and 28, was also designated for release to the public.

On July 24, for the first time in history, the formal deliberations of a congressional committee considering arguments for and against the impeachment of an American President were broadcast over the nation's television and radio networks. By a vote of 27-11 the Committee on July 27, adopted the first article of nine specifications charging the President with obstruction of justice in the investigation of the Watergate break-in. The second article of impeachment, adopted two days later by a vote of 28-10, charged that the President had repeatedly failed to carry out his constitutional oath of office and duty to uphold the nation's laws. The next day, July 30, by a margin of 21-17, the Committee voted to charge the Chief Executive in a third article with unconstitutional defiance of the panel's subpoenas for documents and tape recordings.

On August 8, 1974, President Nixon took the unprecedented step of announcing his intention to resign his office effective the following day. Vice President Gerald Ford took the presidential oath shortly after noon on August 9 to become the 38th President of the United States.

Without debate, the House formally concluded its impeachment inquiry on August 20 and, by a vote of 412-3, accepted the 200,000-word report of the Judiciary Committee recommending the impeachment of Richard M. Nixon (H. Rept. 93-1305).

Rockefeller Confirmation as Vice President—Shortly after assuming the office of the Chief Executive, President Gerald R. Ford, on August 20, formally nominated Nelson A. Rockefeller, the recent governor of New York, to be the Vice President of the United States. The President's action was in accordance with the Twenty-fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution, effective February 23, 1967, establishing procedures whereby a vacancy in the office of president and/or Vice President shall be filled. Mr. Ford had himself assumed the position of Vice President in accordance with these same procedures, taking the oath of office on December 8, 1973.

Foremost among congressional concerns in assessing the qualifications of nominee Rockefeller were his uses of personal wealth for political purposes. The Senate Rules and Administration Committee was sufficiently satisfied with Mr. Rockefeller's responses to their inquiries that its membership voted unanimous approval (S. Ex. Rept. 93-34) of him. The full Senate followed suit and, on December 10, indicated a 90-7 favor for confirmation. In the House, the political use of personal wealth continued to be a subject of close questioning. On December 13, the Judiciary Committee approved (H. Rept. 93-1609) the nomination by a 26-12 vote. The final phase of the proceedings occurred on December 19 when the House, by a vote of 287-128, gave its approval to the nomination. Later that evening the oath of office was administered by the Chief Justice in the Senate chamber with the President in attendance. Mr. Rockefeller became the 41st Vice President of the United States, the second to hold the position through the procedures of the Twenty-fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The occasion also marks the first instance in the history of the Republic when neither the President nor the Vice President held their offices by means of a popular election.

Confirmation of OMB Director and Deputy Director (P.L. 93-250, approved March 2, 1974)—Although a prior effort to statutorily require Senate confirmation of the appointments of the Director and Deputy Director of the Office of Management and Budget had met with a presidential veto on May 18, 1973, which was sustained in the House on May 23, another proposal, now Public Law 93-250, was approved by both Houses the Second Session.

Executive Privilege (Hearings conducted)—At a time when the Congress voted to open its operations and procedures to public scrutiny, the Nixon Administration used executive privilege to withhold vital information from the Congress and block even Federal law enforcement officials and the courts from access to materials which in their judgment bears on possible criminal activity. Executive privilege, even though practiced by past Presidents, is mentioned neither in law nor the Constitution, and has never been tested in the courts. Previous Presidents, however, have made only limited use of executive privilege, and then only to protect legitimate national security interests. On the other hand, President Nixon's interpretation of executive privilege, as expressed by his former Attorney General Richard Kleindienst, was that it may be invoked to prevent any one of the millions of executive agency employees from testifying before a congressional committee. Both Houses have held extensive hearings in the area of executive privilege and the House Committee on Government Operations began drafting legislation to establish criteria governing and restricting the use of executive privilege and to require that all information be made available to the Congress by executive agencies—except when the President himself invokes executive privilege.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

Consumer Product Warranty (P.L. 93-637, approved January 4, 1975)—Both Houses approved one of the most important pieces of consumer-oriented legislation considered by the Congress since the Federal Trade Commission Act was passed in 1914. The Federal Trade Commission Improvement Act of 1974 effects a comprehensive reform of warranties on all consumer products and implements a number of changes in the Federal Trade Commission Act that are designed to improve the Commission's consumer protection abilities. By making warranties of consumer products clear and understandable through creating a uniform terminology of warranty coverage, consumers will for the first time have a clear and concise understanding of the terms of warranties of products they are considering purchasing. The legislation spells out specifically what rights and duties will flow from warranties and provides a number of public and private means of consumer redress for breach of warranty obligations.

The Act codifies the Commission's power to issue trade regulation rules prohibiting conduct which is unfair or deceptive and gives an important new direction to the Commission in order to prohibit unfair or deceptive practices. The procedures to be used in promulgating trade regulation rules are set forth in detail.

Consumer Credit (P.L. 93-495, approved October 28, 1974)—In an amendment to banking regulations legislation, Congress provided for new protection for the consumer buying on credit by prohibiting sex discrimination in granting credit, protecting consumers against unfair billing practices, and providing protection against credit card fraud. In amending the Truth in Lending Act of 1968, the act requires customers to inform creditors in writing of alleged billing errors within sixty days after receiving the bill. Creditors then are required to respond to the disputed billing within thirty days and to resolve the dispute within ninety days by correcting the billing error or explaining why the bill was correct.

Motor Vehicle and Schoolbus Safety Amendments (P.L. 93-492, approved October 27, 1974)—In amendments to the Motor Vehicle and School Bus Safety Act, Congress now requires motor vehicle and tire manufacturers to remedy safety defects or failures either through repair, replacement, or refund procedures. The Department of Transportation is authorized to conduct inspections, testing, and research necessary for the enforcement of safety standards. The Department is also specifically directed to promulgate a fuel system integrity standard within 90 days following the effective date of the act, to protect occupants of vehicles from fuel-fed fires.

In addition, the law prohibits the ignition key interlock system keyed to seat belt use, and also requires that only a warning light be used to indicate that safety belts are not fastened.

Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act (P.L. 93-369, approved August 10, 1974)—Congress passed House-initiated legislation designed to protect consumers from misbranding of perishable agriculture commodities. The Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act gives the Department of Agriculture the option of imposing a monetary penalty, not to exceed $2,000, for violations of the Act, or the option to institute formal proceedings for suspension or revocation of the license of an offending individual or corporation to trade in the fruit and vegetable industry.

Consumer Protection Agency (H.R. 13163 passed the House April 3, 1974)—Consumers would have a powerful representative before government agencies under provisions of Consumer Protection Agency bill passed by the House in 1974. The bill establishes an independent agency within the executive branch which would have the power to intervene in a wide range of Federal administrative proceedings on behalf of consumers. If vital consumer information was unavailable elsewhere, the agency could request other Federal agencies with jurisdiction in the field, to obtain, by subpoena, the information which would then be made public.

The agency also would have the power to appeal to the courts administrative rulings made by other Federal agencies which might be adverse to consumer interests.

In addition to this representative role, the agency would be empowered to: (1) encourage and support research, studies, and testing which would lead to a better understanding of consumer products and improved products, services, and consumer information; (2) submit recommendations annually to both the Congress and the President on measures to improve the operation of the Federal government in the protection and promotion of the interests of consumers; (3) direct the agency to act as a clearing house for consumer complaints and transmit them to the appropriate Federal or non-Federal entities for action; (4) require that the agency maintain a public document room containing a usefully arranged and catalogued collection of significant consumer complaints, and; (5) direct the agency to investigate the feasibility of establishing a National Consumer Information Foundation which would administer a voluntary, self-supporting, information gathering program.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

District of Columbia Home Rule (P.L. 93-198, approved December 24, 1973)—Congress has enacted a home rule charter providing the residents of the District of Columbia with the first elected local government in one hundred years. Passage of this legislation represents the most recent effort on the part of Congress to restore and expand the restricted political rights of the 756,000 resident United States citizens in the District of Columbia by permitting the residents to elect a major and a thirteen member council with legislative powers similar to those of a state legislature. The charter had previously been approved by D.C. residents in a May 1974 referendum.

The Charter Act retains the authority of Congress to review and appropriate the District's budget and there is provision for a congressional review and veto of any act of the elected council. While judges of the local courts will continue to be appointed by the President as has been the law since 1801, there is provision for a new judicial nomination system which guarantees local participation. The Act also authorizes the council to set all tax rates in the District (disallowing, however, the taxing by the council of Federal and State property or the incomes of commuters) and authorizes a Federal payment to the District of $230 million for fiscal 1975, increasing gradually to $300 million by fiscal 1978. Elections are scheduled for November 1974 and the new government is scheduled to take office on January 2, 1975.

Campaign Finance and Political Ethics—(P.L. 93-376, approved August 14, 1974)—Congress, in an effort to keep big money, special interest influence, and conflict of interest out of local politics in the District of Columbia, enacted legislation limiting campaign spending and contributions within the District. Individual contributions are limited in the act to $2,000 and overall spending by mayoral candidates to $200,000. The candidates for chairman of the city council are limited to $150,000 in spending and council candidates to $90,000. The figures are aggregated for primary and general election spending.

The Act also provides that candidates make personal financial disclosures. This provision, in addition, applies to all policy-making employees of the District government. Additionally, lobbyists working in the District government must register and report their activities and expenditures. All reports are to be submitted to a Board of Elections and Ethics with assistance for legal advice and oversight to be provided by the U.S. General Accounting Office.

Hatch Act Exception (P.L. 93-268, approved April 17, 1974)—To assure greater opportunity for residents to participate as candidates in the first partisan local elections in the District of Columbia in over one hundred years, Congress enacted legislation exempting certain public employees in the District covered by the Hatch "No Politics" Act. This congressional action enabled the currently appointed District officials to run for office and others who would otherwise have been excluded as candidates. The exemption expires on January 2, 1975 at which time the U.S. Civil Service Commission is to report to Congress on the overall effects of the exemption on District political affairs for the purpose of providing information for further congressional consideration of Hatch Act amendment legislation.

Indigent Representation in Criminal Cases—(P.L. 93-412, approved September 3, 1974)—Responding to a crisis in the judicial system of the District of Columbia, Congress amended the District of Columbia Criminal Justice Act (88 Stat. 1089) to authorize the District of Columbia to provide a plan for the provision of legal counsel to defendants financially unable to obtain an adequate defense in criminal cases. Congress directed that representation under the plan include counsel and investigative expertise and other services necessary for an adequate defense. The amendment further specifies that legal assistance can be obtained from private attorneys, attorneys from the Public Defender Service, as well as attorneys and qualified students participating in specially supervised programs.

In the enactment of this amendment, Congress has assured counsel to all indigent defendants involved in District of Columbia criminal proceedings as so guaranteed by the Constitution.

Law Review Commission—(P.L. 93-379, approved August 21, 1974)—Congress has acted to authorize the first major examination since 1901 of the laws of the District of Columbia. By establishing a 15-member Law Review Commission composed of local and federal officials, Congress has provided a model mechanism to examine the entire body of common law, case law, and federal law currently in effect in the District of Columbia. The Commission is directed by the legislation to recommend needed reforms in the District Code. For example, currently it is necessary in any case controversy not governed by some provision of the District Code for the courts of this jurisdiction to apply the common law of Maryland, as modified by acts by the British Parliament and its own legislature prior to February 1801. Hence, trial and appellate judges in the District of Columbia, in the present absence of any relevant section of the District Code, frequently must rely on principles of law set forth by the judges of the King's Bench and the House of Lords in the centuries antedating the establishment of federal authority in 1801 over the territory ceded by Maryland to Congress for the establishment of the permanent seat of the national government. Therefore, as the United States begins to observe the bicentennial of its independence, Congress has provided that the Nation's Capital be governed by a modern code of law.

People's Counsel of the District of Columbia (P.L. 93-614, approved January 2, 1974)—Congress has acted to protect the Federal Government and residents of the District of Columbia from excessive, unequal, and unjustifiable utility rate increases. In amending the District of Columbia Self-Government Charter (P.L. 93-198) to provide for a "People's Counsel," Congress has assured District residents of competent advocacy before the Public Service Commission of the District of Columbia in all utility rate increase requests. The legislation further authorizes to be appropriated $100,000 for the first year of operation of the People's Counsel Office.

University of the District of Columbia—(P.L. 93-471, approved October 28, 1974)—Since 1790 Congress has discussed the establishment of a publicly supported university in the Nation's Capital. Such a university was proposed by Presidents Washington, Adams, Jefferson and numerous of their successors. By authorizing the merger of Federal City College, Washington Technical Institute, and D.C. Teachers College into a unified University of the District of Columbia, Congress has recognized the need for a major land-grant university at the national seat of government.

The University of the District of Columbia, to be governed by a 15-member board of trustees, is authorized under this legislation to begin operations in 1976—the Nation's Independence Bicentennial.

District of Columbia Rent Control (P.L. 93-157, approved November 21, 1974)—This Act represents another manifestation of the long-standing concern of Congress to assure adequate, reasonably priced housing for all residents of the District of Columbia. Under this legislation Congress authorized the City Council of the District of Columbia to promulgate rules and regulations to control residential rates and to establish a Housing Rent Commission to enforce these rules and regulations. The City Council acted with dispatch on these matters after receiving the authorized authority provided by this Act. At a time of rising unemployment and inflation, uncontrolled prices, this congressional action was particularly welcomed by the high percentage of District residents who rent their housing.

National Visitor Center Facilities Act Amendments (P.L. 93-478, approved October 28, 1974)—Congress in approving this Act has demonstrated its continuing concern that the 40 million visitors expected in the Nation's Capital during the Independence Bicentennial Commemoration period have a conveniently located, adequate facility to make surface transit connections. These amendments authorize an additional $13 million to complete the National Visitor Center construction improvements under way at Union Station in the District of Columbia and further provide for the construction of appropriate parking, taxi, and bus facilities at Union Station.

Subsidy Payment for Child Adoption (P.L. 93-241, approved January 2, 1974)—Congress provided for an improved system of adoption of children in the District of Columbia by authorizing the Commission of the District of Columbia to make adoption subsidy payments on behalf of children with special needs, where such children otherwise would in all likelihood go without adoption, and where the adoptive family is deemed appropriate in all respects but for its economic inability to meet the child's needs. Currently it is estimated that in the District there are between 2,500 and 2,700 children who are wards of the District Government. Of these it is estimated that between 200 and 300 could be placed in permanent families with the assistance of an adoption subsidy program. Approximately 150 such placements are expected within the first year alone.

ECONOMY

Economic Stabilization Act of 1970 Extension (P.L. 93-28, approved April 30, 1973)—Faced with the pressing concern of a record inflation severely ravaging our economy, Congress extended the Economic Stabilization Act of 1970 which authorizes the President broad powers to stabilize prices, rents, wages and salaries. It also gives the President authority to establish, after public hearings, priorities of use and an allocation system of supplies of petroleum products, including crude oil, in order to equitably meet needs in various sections of the country and to prevent anticompetitive effects which could develop from shortages of petroleum products.

December 20, 1974

Council on Wage and Price Stability (P.L. 93-387, approved August 24, 1974)—In his address to the Congress and the Nation on August 12, 1974, the President urged the Congress to act quickly on a proposal which had been sent to the Congress by the Administration to create a task force on inflation. P.L. 93-387 was passed in response to that request by the President. The Council on Wage and Price Stability established under this bill has power to monitor the economy generally. This legislation grants no mandatory or standby control authority over the economy but, rather, works with labor and management in an effort to improve the structure of collective bargaining and encourage price restraint. The Council is authorized to conduct public hearings to help publicize the inflationary problems and to focus attention on the need to increase productivity in all sectors of our economy.

The Council is to be composed of members appointed by the President and is to be established within the Executive Office of the President. It is expected that the membership of the Council will be composed of senior Government officials closely associated with economic matters, although the President may also appoint four advisers from outside the executive branch.

Productivity Commission (P.L. 93-311, approved June 8, 1974)—This legislation authorizes the extension of the President's National Commission on Productivity and Work Quality. The legislation mandates that the Commission strive for improvements in the morale and quality of work of the American worker, concentrating its efforts where such efforts are likely to make the most substantial impact on the international competitive position of the United States, the efficiency of Government, the cost of goods and services generally considered to fulfill the most basic needs of Americans, and the morale and quality of work of American workers.

Three primary means are provided to implement these objectives: the authority to (1) create labor-management productivity councils; (2) conduct research necessary to achieve its objectives; and (3) promote objectives through public information work.

In addition, the Commission will advise the President and Congress on Government policies affecting productivity and quality of work, coordinate and promote research work by other Government agencies, and provide technical and consulting assistance to labor, industry, and Government in order to help them increase productivity and improve the quality of working life.

Inflation Research (S. Con. Res. 93 passed the House July 31, 1974)—This resolution directs the Joint Economic Committee to undertake an emergency study of the current state of the economy and of the problems relating thereto, with special reference to inflation, including but not limited to the causes of the current inflation and such inflation-related problems as Federal spending, tight money and high interest; food, fuel, and other shortages; credit policies; export policies; international exchange rates; and indexing; and to provide the Congress with specific recommendations for legislation to remedy the existing ills and improve the performance of the economy. The sum of $100,000 was appropriated to the Joint Committee for the above purposes; a report of its findings and recommendations was to be made to the Congress by December 31, 1974.

Antitrust Law Amendments (P.L. 93-528, approved December 21, 1974)—This legislation, the first major reform of antitrust laws in nearly twenty years, makes three basic changes in antitrust legislation. The first provides that district courts are to make an independent determination as to whether or not the entry of a proposed consent judgment is in the public interest as expressed by the antitrust laws. The legislation seeks to accomplish this end by encouraging additional comment by interested parties, requiring that the Department of Justice file a public impact statement, and requiring the defendants to disclose all communications made on behalf of the firm relating to the consent decree other than those made exclusively by counsel of record.

The second change in the antitrust laws effected by this legislation is an increase in the maximum criminal fine for violation of the Sherman Act to $1 million if a corporation, or $100,000 if any other person. The legislation also provides that antitrust violations be redefined as felonies rather than misdemeanors, and further provides for maximum three-year jail terms for violators.

A third change is the amendment of the Expedited Act so as to require that final judgments and interlocutory orders in certain civil antitrust cases, if appealed, be heard by the circuit courts of appeals, except in cases where a district court judge agrees to certify that an appeal of his ruling on an antitrust case should go directly to the Supreme Court because of its public impact.

Public Works and Economic Development Act (P.L. 93-46, approved June 18, 1973)—Congress voted to continue the Economic Development Administration for one year and to continue important direct Federal support for the seven regional economic commissions. To further continue support for economically depressed areas and achieve minimum unemployment, Congress extended the Public Works and Economic Development Act through fiscal year 1974. For this Congress authorized funds for public facility grant programs, business development programs, technical assistance in alleviating unemployment in certain of our Nation's areas, and for economic development centers. The Public Works and Economic Development Act, originally enacted in 1965, provides Federal assistance to areas that lag behind the growth of the rest of the Nation and suffer from high unemployment and underemployment. With the Act's extension, Congress continues to provide Federal assistance, in cooperation with States and localities, to enable areas and regions suffering economic distress to help themselves to develop the planning and financing capability for long lasting economic improvement and for the creation of permanent jobs. It is estimated that the public facilities grant program alone has made possible some 330,000 permanent jobs in over 1,460 communities across the country. A conservative estimate for the entire program would bring the figure to over half a million jobs located by these programs since enactment of this legislation in 1965.

Economic Development (P.L. 93-423, approved September 27, 1974)—In approving this legislation, Congress decided against an Administration proposal to phase out the existing economic development program and replace it with a block grant assistance program. Instead, the Public Works and Economic Development Act of 1965 was extended through fiscal 1976, with $680 million and $795 million being authorized for fiscal 1975 and 1976, respectively. This legislation also authorized the Economic Development Administration to guarantee direct loans and working capital loans made by private lending institutions to borrowers in "redevelopment areas" or "economic development centers." This assistance is designed to increase the business development opportunities in distressed areas of our large cities, particularly in special impact areas where vacant buildings are available for the occupation of new business ventures. It is expected that working capital loans will be made to businesses which have experienced, or may be reasonably foreseen to be about to experience, temporary but severe problems involving actual or potential job loss, for reasons including but not limited to the closing of Federal installations, environmental orders resulting in plant shutdowns, and Federal energy allocations.

The legislation also authorized a demonstration program to evaluate and test new approaches to economic development and to assist in meeting special needs arising from actual or threatened severe unemployment from existing or expected economic dislocation.

Disaster Relief (P.L. 93-288, approved May 22, 1974)—Congress passed amendments to the 1970 Disaster Relief Act which were designed to streamline and improve Federal disaster relief programs. Among the changes implemented by these amendments was authority for the President to distinguish between emergencies and major disasters; also, States were authorized to receive a one-time grant of $250,000 to assist in developing a comprehensive disaster relief program and made eligible for Federal assistance to offset damage to parks and recreation facilities. The legislation also extends more comprehensive Federal assistance to victims of disasters and includes authority for the President to grant States funds to provide direct financial aid of up to $5000 to persons sustaining extraordinary disaster-related damage not otherwise covered by law. The President was also empowered to provide unemployment assistance up to the maximum weekly benefits prescribed by law to persons losing their jobs because of disasters; for such persons, the benefit eligibility period was extended from 26 weeks to one year. The legislation also provides for financial assistance to local governments suffering financial loss because of disasters. The law further authorizes funds for Recovery Planning Councils, to be established by State governors, which would draft five-year recovery investment plans and make grants to governmental and nonprofit corporations to improve public works, public services, or public facilities, including parks and recreational areas.

Small Business Administration (P.L. 93-386, approved August 23, 1974)—With the approval of this legislation, action was completed giving the Small Business Administration authority to continue making loans to small businesses for the duration of fiscal 1975. The overall ceiling on outstanding loans was increased from $4.875 billion to $6 billion; various lending subceilings were also increased. The SBA was also directed to make $400 million in direct loans during fiscal 1975, a reversal of SBA policy stressing Federally guaranteed loans by private banks rather than direct loans of Federal funds. This legislation also established within the SBA a chief counsel for advocacy to act as ombudsman for small businessmen affected by SBA decisions and formally transferred to SBA the minority business programs that had been operated under authority granted by the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964. Also provided for was the appointment of an associate SBA administrator for minority business.

Deposit Insurance (P.L. 93-495, approved October 28, 1974)—This legislation provides deposit insurance of $100,000 per account for public units and raise deposit insurance on other accounts from $20,000 to $40,000. It is hoped that the enactment of this provision, while not offered as a total solution, will further help relieve the present credit crisis by providing wider selection, higher yield, and greater convenience for public officials who have custody of public funds and will provide a significant incentive for individual depositors to utilize those financial institutions concerned with making available home mortgage funds at reasonable interest rates.

An increase in deposit insurance from $20,000 to $40,000 for accounts in commercial banks, mutual savings banks, savings and loan associations, and credit unions can be justified on the basis of the effects of inflation alone. The increase will insure 75% of all insured bank deposits and over 95% of savings and loan associations deposits with negligible impact on the respective insurance funds. Savings accounts in many instances represent an individual's entire life savings. The increase to $40,000 permits the average saver to have absolute security.

The legislation also includes the establishment of a National Commission on Electronic Fund Transfers and provisions which make it unlawful for any creditor to discriminate against any applicant on the basis of sex or marital status with respect to any aspect of a credit transaction.

Interest Rate Control (P.L. 93-100, approved August 16, 1973)—Congress extended until December 31, 1974 authority for Federal bank regulatory agencies authority to set feasible interest rates on time and savings deposits held by commercial banks, savings and loan institutions, and mutual savings banks. The law limited NOW, or interest bearing, checking accounts, to two states, Massachusetts and New Hampshire, on an experimental basis under Federal supervision. In addition, the law permits national banks and savings and loan associations chartered by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board to invest in State housing corporations in the States where their headquarters are located, and it creates a new procedure for payment by savings and loan associations of premiums into the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation's Reserve Fund.

Interest Equalization Tax Extension Act (P.L. 93-17, approved April 10, 1973)—Another major congressional initiative extended the application of the interest equalization tax for 15 months, to June 30, 1974, and provided for certain exclusions from the tax. It is the interest equalization tax which equalizes the differential in interest costs as between domestic and foreign securities, thus assisting to stem our outflow of dollars.

Regulation of Interest Rates Payable on Obligations of Federal Depository Institutions (P.L. 93-501, approved October 20, 1974)—This Act amends Section 19(a) of the Federal Reserve Act to authorize the Federal Reserve Board to regulate debt obligations of a parent holding company or an affiliate of a member bank, regardless of the use of the proceeds within the holding company. Similar authority was granted to the Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation with respect to parent holding companies and affiliates of insured non-member banks. The Act exempts from its provisions any bank holding company which has filed, prior to the date of enactment, an irrevocable declaration with the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System to divest itself of all its banks under Section 4 of the Bank Holding Company Act.

Action on this legislation reflects the concern of the Congress that financial institutions be able to attract and retain deposits in periods of high interest rates and strong competition for funds in the capital markets. Thus, Congress has provided the Federal Reserve Board with discretionary authority to regulate bank holding company notes, regardless of the use of the proceeds, taking into account the benefits which small savers could derive from such an innovative approach, and balancing them with the objective of promoting an adequate supply of mortgage money through financial intermediaries. It was felt that the particular ineligibility of thrift institutions, as presently structured, to compete adequately for funds in a climate of high interest rates might justify the grant of authority in this act, but it was also felt that such legislation may be unnecessary if appropriate comprehensive financial reform legislation is enacted.

Federal Financing Bank (P.L. 93-224, approved December 29, 1973)—This Act establishes a Federal Financing Bank under the general supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury through which the marketing of Federal and federally-assisted borrowing activities will be centralized. The Bank is authorized to purchase and sell any obligation issued, sold, or guaranteed by a Federal agency, with a minimum interest rate set by the Treasury. Advance submission of financing plans to the Treasury will be required for approval of the financing methods, timing, interest rates, maturities, and other terms and conditions of issues or sales of obligations. An initial capitalization is set with a specified ceiling to be set on obligations outstanding at any one time.

Fraudulent Checking Relief Act (P.L. 93-539, approved December 22, 1974)—Under terms of this Act, the responsibility of the United States Treasury to provide payment from the check forgery insurance fund to payees and special indorsees whose names are forged on U.S. checks is extended to permit such payment for checks drawn abroad from depositories designated by the United States Treasury. These checks may be drawn in U.S. dollars or in foreign currency. The legislation was proposed as a means of equalizing the practice with regard to checks drawn abroad.

Consistent with the original provisions of this law as enacted in 1941, four conditions must be met before payment is authorized: (1) if the check has been lost or stolen, the payee or holder must be without fault; (2) the check must have been paid by the Treasurer based on a forged endorsement; (3) the payee did not participate in these proceedings; and (4) reclamation of the check may not be prompt or successful, thus necessitating payment.

Public Debt Limit Extension (P.L. 93-53, approved July 1, 1973)—Congress continued the debt limitation level at $465 billion through November 30, 1973. This measure in addition extended unemployment insurance benefits in States whose rates of insured unemployment are at least 4.5 percent; extended for one year the authorization for project grants under the maternal and child health program which was scheduled to expire June 30, 1973; and provided for a transition in funding to a state-coordinated program of maternal and child health programs. Congress also requires the presidential campaign checkoff provisions on the income tax return form to be placed either on the front page of the return or where signature is required. Congress also eliminated separate funds for the two major parties, consolidating all money into a general fund.

Second Public Debt Limit Extension (P.L. 93-173, approved December 3, 1973)—Congress approved for a second time this session an extension of the temporary Federal debt limit through the end of fiscal 1974, increasing the ceiling to $475.7 billion. The previously existing $465 billion temporary debt limit expired on November 30 allowing the ceiling to fall to its permanent $400 billion level. During the course of debate, the House deleted $2.3 billion from the committee's recommended debt ceiling.

Par Value Modification Act (P.L. 93-110, approved September 21, 1973)—This Act authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to raise the price of gold to $422.2 an ounce from $38 (a devaluation of ten percent) and repeals a prohibition on ownership of gold by private citizens when the President determines that repeal would not affect adversely the international monetary position to the United States. The law ratifies the Administration's 1971 agreement to international monetary reform, precipitated by inflation and by the worst trade imbalance in U.S. history.

Increase of Temporary Limit on Public Debt (P.L. 93-325, approved June 30, 1974)—The permanent debt limitation under present law is $400 billion; this legislation provides for an increase in the temporary debt limit-tation from $475.7 billion to $495 billion through March 31, 1975. No change is made in the permanent debt limit. The Administration had requested an increase in the debt limitation to $505 billion through June 30, 1975. However, Congress enacted a lower limit, believing that the lower figure would provide a restraint on spending in the coming year and further believing that it is desirable to use the debt limitation as a means for providing at least some overall congressional control over the budget until the Congress implements fully a legislative system for examining and controlling budget totals and budget components.

EDUCATION

Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 Amendments (P.L. 93-380, approved August 21, 1974)—Considered by many as one of the most important and comprehensive elementary and secondary education bills in many years, the House reaffirmed its commitment to excellence in the Nation's schools by amending and extending the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 and other education programs. The measure extends through 1978 such activities as the School Library Program, Programs for Supplemental Educational Centers for Guidance, Counseling and Testing, Bilingual Education Programs, and Programs of Assistance to Local Educational Agencies for the Education of Indian Children. The Act provides for a continuation of the special incentive grant program which gave bonuses to States that exceeded the national average for financing public education under Title I, the plan for distributing federal compensatory education funds for disadvantaged children. $50-million will be set aside for the grant program from regular Title I funds. Grants for State-run programs for handicapped, migratory, neglected and delinquent children will continue on a level that assures that no State will receive less for such programs in fiscal 1975-78 than it did in fiscal 1974.

Conferees on the bill agreed to the House provision consolidating seven categorical grant programs into two new ones, a library and instructional resources program and an innovation and support services program. Conferees agreed to the House authorization level of $745-million for the two consolidations for fiscal 1975 and open-ended authorizations for fiscal 1976-77. The issue of busing students to achieve racial balance in the public schools was resolved by a compromise agreement with the Senate version of the measure and prohibits any student from being bused beyond the school next closest to his home. On the matter of impact aid, the measure will extend relief through fiscal 1978 providing subsidization to school districts on behalf of students whose parents live and/or work on Federal property. The Adult Education Act, extended through 1978, received authorized funding of $725-million. A newly created Bureau for the Education and Training of the Handicapped within the Office of Education will provide handicapped Americans with continued programs and aids. The Bilingual Education Act has been expanded and authorized a total of $585 million through fiscal 1978. More money than ever before will become available for teacher language training.

The Act establishes a new reading program that will provide special emphasis projects to determine the effectiveness of intensive instruction, for reading training on public television and for the establishment of reading academies to assist youths and adults who would not otherwise receive assistance. Another provision of the Act deals with the issue of student privacy. Federal funds will be denied to any educational institution that refuses parents access to a student file or grants access to a student file without parental consent to anyone but another school official. In another area, grants ranging from $100,000 to $1-million will be provided to assist the states in evolving plans, following certain federal guidelines, to equalize state education expenditures among their school districts.

Educational Funding and Guaranteed Student Loans (P.L. 93-269, approved April 18, 1974)—Congress extended provisions of the General Education Provisions Act which permit school districts and State educational agencies to carry over funds appropriated in one fiscal year for expenditure in the following fiscal year. The provisions, in addition, allow districts and agencies to carry over unexpended fiscal 1973 funds, made available in fiscal 1974, for expenditure in fiscal 1975. Forward funding and permission to carry funds from one fiscal year to the next are intended to insure that school officials are able to make the wisest use of the funds without pressures to spend quickly following late availability of the funds. This Act also amends the provisions of Title IV of the Higher Education Act, concerning interest subsidy payments on guaranteed student loans, to eliminate a "needs" test for students whose families have an adjusted gross income of less than $15,000 and who borrow more than $2,000 in any academic year.

School Lunch Programs (P.L. 93-150, approved November 7, 1973)—Congress increased Federal aid to school nutrition programs hard hit by rising food costs in order to more adequately meet the nutrition requirements of needy children in our public school systems. The Federal payment per school lunch served was increased to ten cents, from the existing level of eight cents. The Act also increases Federal payments for free and reduced-price lunches served to needy students and for school breakfasts. The Federal payment for free lunches is increased to 45 cents, from 40 cents, and the minimum payment per reduced-price lunch to 35 cents, from 30 cents. Although President Nixon opposed the two-cent increase and threatened to veto the measure Congress sought to reduce the financial burden to the States and the approximately 28,000,000 students participating in the programs. The Act guarantees to the States cash payments instead of school food commodities in situations in which the Federal Government could not deliver food during a school year. The eligibility requirements were broadened for fiscal 1974 for the reduced price lunch program to children of families whose income was as much as 75 percent over the applicable poverty guidelines prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture. The Act requires that school lunch funds be allocated to the States by a formula based on the number of free and reduced-price lunches served, rather than on the number of children classified as coming from low-income families. A special provision authorizes semiannual cost-of-living adjustments beginning January 1, 1974 to reflect automatically changes in the consumer price index for food served away from home. Congress also assured that children who qualify for free lunches shall also be eligible for free milk.

National School Lunch Amendments of 1974 (P.L. 93-326, approved June 30, 1974)—Action taken by both Houses during the Second Session assures that school lunch programs will continue to receive the normal level of agricultural commodities which for many years have been purchased and distributed to schools by the Department of Agriculture. This action was considered necessary in order to assure that the nutritional quality of the lunches served to children in the Nation's schools will be maintained. The Act further authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture, on a permissive basis, to utilize certain Federal funds to maintain the annually programmed level of direct food assistance to the school lunch program. Such provision was required because the Secretary of Agriculture's authority to purchase commodities at market prices when crop surpluses were not available expired June 30, 1974.

Child Nutrition Programs (P.L. 93-13, approved March 30, 1973)—Because of a delay in purchases of food commodities for child nutrition programs by the Department of Agriculture, Congress was prompted early in the first session to pass legislation requiring that Federal commodity purchases for the school lunch and breakfast programs remain at the level budgeted by Congress for fiscal year 1973. The Secretary of Agriculture was required to determine by March 15 the total value of commodities the Department would be able to deliver to the States in the remaining four months of fiscal 1973 and to pay the difference by April 15 to State education agencies if the total value of those commodities was less than 90 percent of the value of commodities originally programmed. At the time this Act was passed, donations of beef, pork, cheese, fruits and vegetables were running behind, threatening the nutritional content of school meals and the continuation of free lunches for needy youngsters. Most States were receiving half as much in commodities as they received last year, and some States were even receiving as little as 30 percent of last year's level.

White House Conference on Libraries (P.L. 93-568, approved December 31, 1974)—This legislation authorizes a White House Conference on Library and Information Services no later than 1978, to be composed of representatives of Federal, State, and local governments, professional and lay people, and other members of the general public. It also establishes an Advisory Committee to be made up of (1) five persons designated by the Speaker of the House, not more than three of whom may be Members of the House; (2) five persons designated by the President pro tem of the Senate, not more than three of whom may be Members of the Senate; and (3) not more than fifteen persons appointed by the President. A total of $3,500,000 is authorized for expenses.

Amendments to the measure alter the scope and terms of the Federal Student Privacy Act of 1974, by (1) applying the law, providing for student access to records on themselves, to educational agencies and institutions which receive funds from the Office of Education, (2) defining records to which they may have access, (3) making "directory information" available to the public without special consent if public notice is given and a parent if given the opportunity to object to its release, by exempting certain records from review by students in institutions of postsecondary education, and providing for waiver of access to certain confidential recommendations, but providing that such a waiver cannot be required as a precondition of admission, employment, or receipt of awards.

Other amendments require that hearings by educational agencies and institutions be conducted in accordance with regulations issued by the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, permit students and parents to insert written explanations into their education records, define a "student", broaden the access to education records, prohibit regionalization of the funds of the Secretary of HEW, and clarify third party access to education records.

Finally, this legislation also amends Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 by providing that the prohibition on sex discrimination shall not apply to membership practices of (1) certain social fraternities and social sororities, consisting primarily of students in attendance at an institution of higher education; and (2) voluntary youth service organizations, including the YMCA, the YWCA, Girl Scouts, Campfire Girls, and Boy Scouts, the membership of which traditionally has been limited to persons of one sex and to persons of 19 years of age or less.

National Foundation for the Arts and Humanities (P.L. 93-133, approved October 19, 1973)—Congress has approved legislation substantially increasing authorizations for the National Foundation for the Arts and Humanities which has advanced Federal and local encouragement and support for the arts and humanities. Congress authorized a total of $145 million for fiscal 1974, $200 million for fiscal 1975, and $252 million for fiscal 1976. The minimum allotment for Federal arts grants to the States was increased to $200,000 from $65,000, and Federal art funds were authorized to be used for payment of up to 50 percent of the total cost of an approved project. Should the total allotment of the project exceed $125,000, excess funds could be used to finance the entire cost of project so long as the total amount of full Federal funding did not exceed 20 percent of the total State allotment. For the humanities endowment, the new law provides equal funding with the arts and a requirement that the chairman correlate humanities programs with the States. The law increases to $17,500 the limit on grants made by the chairman without consent of the respective councils.

Basic Educational Opportunity Grants (P.L. 93-35, approved May 16, 1973)—Congress determined that for the first time grants under the new Basic Educational Opportunity Grants program should be limited to first year full-time college students, thereby increasing individual grants to an average $250 and a maximum $600. Had Congress not limited the funds to first year students, the average grant under the program, it is estimated, would have only been a total of $80, costing $10 to administer per student. Funds for the grant program totaled $122 million in fiscal 1973. The Act also extends the National Commission on the Financing of Postsecondary Education to June 30, 1974.

Professional Education Fellowship Program (P.L. 93-343, approved August 21, 1974)—This measure provides that fellowships for disadvantaged students to attend law school may be granted without regard to the limitations imposed by the Higher Education Act of 1965, as amended by P.L. 92-318, the Education Amendments of 1972. Essentially, this Act permits the Commissioner of Education to continue the program of grants operated by the Council of Legal Educational Opportunity on the same terms under which it had previously been operated by the Office of Economic Opportunity.

Alcohol and Drug Abuse Education Act Amendments of 1974 (P.L. 93-422, approved September 21, 1974)—With passage of this Act, Congress reaffirmed its clear intent to wage all-out war on the ravages of drug abuse and alcoholism. The measure extends the Drug Abuse Education Act of 1970 grant and contract authorities for another three years, through fiscal 1977, adds alcoholism to its authority, and makes the Commissioner of Education responsible for over-all administration. It authorizes a total of $90 million over the next three years and requires that not less than 60% of this money be used for programs and projects in elementary and secondary schools. Activities that will be funded under the Act will include development, testing, evaluation and dissemination of curricular materials; development of comprehensive schools and community programs that focus on the causes of youthful drug and alcohol abuse; pre-service and in-service training for school personnel, law enforcement officers, and other public service and community leaders; and public education programs for parents and other interested persons in the community. Up to 10% of the sums appropriated will be available to State education agencies for the costs of assisting local education agencies in developing and carrying out drug and alcohol education programs. Not more than 1% of sums appropriated will be used for independent analysis and evaluation of programs, and an annual evaluation report will be submitted to the congressional authorizing and appropriating committees.

Environmental Education Extension (H.R. 3927) passed the House October 24, 1973.—This legislation extends the Environmental Education Act (P.L. 91-516) for three years, authorizing appropriations of $5 million in fiscal 1974, $15 million in fiscal 1975 and $25 million in fiscal 1976. First approved by Congress in 1970, the Act supports environmental education in elementary and secondary schools and in communities through curriculum development, teacher training, aid to State and local education agencies, preparation and distribution of materials for the mass media, planning of outdoor ecological study centers, and establishment of community education programs.

ENERGY

National Emergency Energy Act (S. 2589) vetoed by the President on March 6, 1974.—In an attempt to face immediately the problems of energy shortages, Congress approved the Emergency Energy Act which authorizes a variety of emergency measures to conserve and allocate available energy resources, including investing the President the exclusive right to declare rationing. The act establishes a system of congressional approval for such energy conservation measures as restricting store hours, setting shorter workweeks and requiring car pooling. Any conservation measures proposed by the President or his staff between now and March 1 can go into effect immediately. Either House of Congress, however, can repeal them by a majority vote within 15 legislative days of their taking effect until Congress has had 15 legislative days to study them. Either House could veto a conservation measure by a majority vote. After June 30, any presidential proposal to conserve energy will require approval by both Houses of Congress as a part of the regular legislative process, that is, through introduction and passage of a bill. The Act also provides general guidelines for granting priorities for scarce fuel, such as for moving men and farmers, and it provides for strict antitrust provisions. Any inclusion of fees or taxes in presidential rationing plans, without the express consent of Congress, is banned.

Emergency Petroleum Allocation Act (P.L. 93-159), approved November 27, 1973.—Although Congress gave the President authority to require sensible allocation of available fuel supplies nearly a year ago under the Economic Stabilization Act Amendments (P.L. 93-28), Congress was compelled because of President Nixon's delay in taking action to require the President to put into effect a mandatory allocation program within 30 days of enactment of P.L. 93-159. Additional time was granted for the allocation of gasoline and products already being allocated under the President's current plan, including propane, home heating oils and jet diesel fuels. The measure also covers the allocation of crude oil and refined petroleum products and permits retailers to pass on to consumers increases in wholesale prices while banning most oil exports and offering protection for independent retailers and refiners. Congress specified objectives to be considered by the President in drafting Federal regulations to establish guidelines for the use of fuels taking into consideration priorities such as maintenance of residential heating, operation of refineries at full capacity, protection of small refineries and maintenance of fuel production.

Extension of the Emergency Petroleum Allocation Act of 1973 (P.L. 93-511), approved December 5, 1974.—Recognizing the continuing need for petroleum allocation and pricing oversight by the Federal Government, Congress passed this bill to extend the life of the Emergency Petroleum Allocation Act of 1973 to August 31, 1975. The original act (P.L. 93-159) was passed in November 1973 in response to that summer's gasoline shortages and the Arab embargo on oil shipments to the United States following the Middle East war. This legislation puts priority in maintaining an adequate supply of home heating fuel, a priority which many House Members felt was responsible for the gasoline shortages of the winter of 1973-74. It is expected that full oversight hearings of the administration of this act will be conducted early in the next Congress to determine if the act should be continued and whether substantive amendments should be considered.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Federal Energy Administration (P.L. 93-275), approved May 7, 1974.—In light of an independent Federal Energy Administration to coordinate energy programs and evaluate our energy supplies and needs. The main purposes of this Act are to establish an integrated federal policy for conserving our scarce energy supplies, expanding our usable energy sources, and assuring a fair and equitable distribution of energy at reasonable consumer prices. To these ends, the Administrator of the Federal Energy Administration, appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, is responsible for directing programs concerning the production, conservation, use, control, distribution, rationing and allocation of all forms of energy.

The Administrator is to develop a comprehensive national energy policy designed to alleviate the energy shortage. Public reports on the nature, extent, and projected duration of the shortage, its economic impact, and governmental action being taken, are required. Special studies of petrochemicals, foreign ownership of domestic energy sources and supplies, our hydroelectric generating facilities, and the exportation of coal and petroleum projects are also to be undertaken.

Congress has appropriated $75 million for fiscal year 1974 and $200 million each for fiscal years 1975 and 1976 to the Federal Energy Administration for the purpose of implementing these goals and programs.

Energy Supply and Environmental Coordination (P.L. 93-319), approved June 22, 1974.—In order to promote the use of coal, one of our indigenous and cheaper fuels, Congress passed legislation authorizing the Federal Energy Administration to prohibit powerplants and fuel burning installations with coal burning capabilities from using natural gas or petroleum products as their primary energy source. The Administrator may also require that proposed powerplants be designed and constructed with coal use capabilities. Although pollution standards are temporarily relaxed, a timetable for the commercial utilization of emission control technology is established.

A number of studies and public reports are required under this Act. The Secretary of Transportation, in consultation with the Federal Energy Administrator, is to develop an emergency mass transportation assistance program which may include legislative recommendations for federal grants and tax incentives. An appropriation of $3.5 million is authorized for a study on the chronic effects of exposure to sulfur oxide emissions. The Federal Energy Administration is directed to conduct an energy conservation study, including the possibilities of reducing energy demands, and the methods for increasing efficiency in the industrial use of energy. The Department of Transportation and the Federal Energy Administration are to conduct a joint study on the feasibility of increasing gas mileage through the establishment of fuel economy standards.

The Federal Energy Administration is also responsible for issuing quarterly reports on our domestic reserves and production of crude oil, natural gas and coal, the quantity and distribution of fuel imports, refinery activities, and inventories. If necessary, the Federal Energy Administrator may subpoena information for inclusion in the report.

Energy Research and Development Administration (P.L. 93-348), approved October 11, 1974.—Congress approved H.R. 11510, a reorganization and consolidation of certain functions of the Federal government in a new Energy Research and Development Administration and in a Nuclear Energy Commission in order to promote more efficient management of such functions. The new Energy Research Administration will be headed by an Administrator who would be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. Serving under the Administrator will be five Assistant Administrators, who, respectively, will head the following five major areas: first, fossil energy development; second, nuclear energy development; third, research and advanced energy systems; fourth, environment safety and conservation; and fifth, national security. The authority of the Administration includes nonregulatory functions of the Atomic Energy Commission, in addition to energy research and development programs from other agencies. The Atomic Energy Commission, renamed the Nuclear Energy Commission, is to continue as a smaller organization to administer nuclear licensing and related functions. The Energy Administration is to serve as a central agency to develop energy policies and programs while exercising the central responsibility for planning, managing, supporting and conducting research and development programs and projects involving all energy sources and energy utilization techniques. Its range of programs will be broad, encompassing but not limited to, solar, tidal, wind, hydrogen, fossil fuel, synthetic fuel, nuclear and geothermal sources and processes. It will seek to exploit all promising energy potentials based on present knowledge and to take new directions pointed to by future research results. The Administration's overall responsibilities also will include the encouragement and conduct of research and development for the conservation of energy, for increasing the efficiency and reliability of energy sources and energy-utilizing devices, and for safeguarding the quality of our environment.

Special Energy Research and Development Appropriation (P.L. 93-322), approved June 30, 1974.—Recognizing the urgent need to expand research in the area of developing new energy resources, Congress appropriated for the first time in a regular appropriation bill $2.2 billion for energy research and development in the 1974 fiscal year. Under this Act, $1.5 billion is appropriated for atomic energy research, $571 million for coal research, $102 million for solar and geothermal energy research and $54 million for pollution control. The development of low cost, non-polluting, indigenous energy sources is a primary aim of a comprehensive program to combat inflation, protect the environment and achieve independence from foreign energy sources.

Solar Heating and Cooling Demonstration Act (P.L. 93-409), approved September 3, 1974.—As part of a continuing effort to develop new sources of energy, Congress passed legislation providing $60 million for a 5-year program demonstrating the feasibility of using solar energy to heat and cool buildings. Recognizing that solar energy offers a low cost, non-polluting alternative to fuel oil use, Congress acted to stimulate the commercial adaptation of solar energy technology. This program authorizes federal grants and loans to homeowners who agree to use solar energy in their homes, to business which produce solar energy use equipment, and for applied research in the solar energy field. At least 1,000 residential demonstration units in different geographic areas are contemplated. Federally owned and commercial buildings will also serve as demonstration projects. Under this program, different types of solar energy systems can be evaluated and their costs projected so that American homeowners may be made aware of the benefits, costs and potential of solar energy use. It has been estimated that over 25% of all energy consumed in the United States is used for heating and cooling buildings. If a third of that power is saved by the practical application of solar energy, it could save $6 billion a year, while preserving our diminishing fossil fuel resources.

Solar Energy Research, Development and Demonstration Act (P.L. 93-473), approved October 26, 1974.—Recognizing the need for the United States to develop independent sources of energy and the fact that solar energy offers the most abundant potential energy source, the Congress passed H.R. 16371 ensuring this energy source would be fully utilized. The Act establishes a Solar Energy Coordination and Management Project composed of five members representing those Federal agencies currently involved in solar energy research—the National Science Foundation, the Atomic Energy Commission, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the Department of Housing and Urban Development, and the Federal Power Commission. An additional member will be appointed, and the chairman designated, by the President.

The Project has three essential responsibilities: (1) to determine and evaluate the resource base by developing better methods for predicting availability, measuring the quality and quantity of solar resources, collecting, evaluating and assessing information gleaned from inventories, regional surveys and the exchange of data with other nations, and formulating legislative recommendations for a Federal leasing policy; (2) research and development of solar energy technology including the practical application of such technology and its environmental impact; and (3) the demonstration of the technical and economic feasibility of solar energy utilization through the design and construction of power plants using direct conversion of solar energy, windpower, ocean thermal gradients and organic waste materials. The Project will coordinate and approve all solar energy programs, a function which will be transferred to the Federal Energy Research and Development Administration when it is established.

The Chairman of the Project is also directed to establish a Solar Energy Information Data Bank, a Solar Energy Research Institute and a Solar Energy Incentives Task Force empowered to make legislative recommendations designed to accelerate the commercial application and consumer utilization of solar energy. The National Science Foundation is responsible for developing and supporting scientific and technical education in the solar energy field.

Geothermal Energy Research, Development and Demonstration Act (P.L. 93-410), approved September 3, 1974.—Recognizing that the generation of electrical energy from geothermal resources is potentially economically and environmentally desirable, Congress enacted legislation providing for the utilization of these existing resources through the establishment of a Geothermal Energy Coordination and Management Project. The Project will include five members representing Federal agencies currently involved in geothermal research and development—the National Science Foundation, the Department of Interior, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the Atomic Energy Commission and the Federal Energy Administration—and one member appointed by the President. The primary responsibilities of the Project are (1) resource inventory and assessment, including the improvement of techniques for locating and evaluating geothermal resources, developing better methods for projecting their power potential, and formulating legislative recommendations for a Federal leasing policy; (2) research and development, particularly in the areas of improving existing drilling methods, other extraction techniques and emission control, developing processes for the conversion of by-products to useful purposes, and identifying the social, legal, economic, and environmental consequences of geothermal energy utilization; (3) demonstration of geothermal energy potential through the construction and design of pilot plants and test facilities for component evaluation; and (4) loan guarantees up to $50 million annually for the commercial development of geothermal energy technology. The National Science Foundation is also directed to support scientific education programs to assure sufficient personnel for the implementation of this program.

Geothermal energy offers a major alternative energy source, which, if fully developed, is capable of producing 395 billion watts of geothermal electricity by the year 2000, according to a 1972 RAND study. Geothermal resources include steam, brine, hot water and hot rocks which also produce valuable by-products such as potable water and mineral compounds when processed.

Alaska Pipeline (P.L. 93-153), approved November 16, 1973.—The Congress cleared the way for immediate construction across Alaska of a 789-mile oil pipeline, to be built by a consortium of seven oil companies at a cost now estimated at $4.5 billion. The pipeline will carry oil from Alaska's rich North Slope fields at Prudhoe Bay nearly 800 miles through the permafrost and tundra to the southern port of Valdez. From there, the oil will be shipped by tankers to the West Coast. It is estimated that by 1980 these fields can supply 2 million barrels a day of the total anticipated U.S. daily need of 22 million barrels. The Act imposes strict damage liability of up to $50 million without regard to fault on the owners of the pipeline for any polluting incident on land. Strict liability on the owners of tankers carrying oil from the pipeline without regard to fault is set at $100 million for any one oil spill, with the owner or operator liable for the first $14 million and a liability fund, set up in the bill, liable for the balance. Congress also authorized the Secretary of the Interior to issue a permit granting a right-of-way across Federal lands for construction of the pipeline and barred further judicial review of the pipeline's impact under the National Environmental Policy Act. Congress included two unrelated provisions one of which allows the Federal Trade Commission to seek preliminary injunctions to stop deceptive or unfair practices and to represent itself in court if the Justice Department fails to take action within ten days. The second provision allows independent regulatory agencies to seek data from businesses without the approval of the Office of Management and Budget, if the General Accounting Office certifies that the information is not available elsewhere and no major burden is placed on the businesses.

Emergency National Maximum Highway Speed Limit (P.L. 93-239), approved January 2, 1974.—To effect an immediate decrease in gasoline fuel consumption, Congress passed legislation seeking to create uniformity throughout the United States in reduced speed limits by permitting States to lower their speed limits below 55 miles per hour, and setting a mandatory 55-mile-per-hour limit on multiple-lane highways which were divided by medial barriers. The Secretary of Transportation is directed to cut off Federal highway funds to States which failed to establish a maximum speed of 55 miles per hour within 60 days of enactment. The Act also authorizes the use of up to $1 million in Federal highway funds for each State which establishes a one-year demonstration program to encourage the use of car pools and sets an expiration date for the legislation of June 30, 1975.

The primary thrust of the bill is to conserve energy. It was also necessary, however, to come up with the proper speeds which would not only present an optimum of fuel savings, but at the same time preserve the economic, safety and public-acceptance considerations which would make such a provision most effective. It serves as an action which can be done now without any cost to the Federal Government and can be a major step forward in conserving energy.

Natural Gas Pipeline Safety Act Amendments of 1974 (P.L. 93-403), approved August 30, 1974.—Since 1969, fatalities resulting from natural gas pipeline accidents have nearly tripled in number. Through the enactment of the National Pipeline Safety Act Amendments of 1974 Congress has provided for an extension of Public Law 90-480 which created, for the first time, comprehensive, complete, and enforceable safety procedures regulating the pipeline transportation of flammable, toxic, and corrosive gases. Specifically the Act (1) directs the Secretary of Transportation to establish standards for collection, transmission and distribution of natural gas; (2) sets civil penalties for violations of the Act; (3) provides authorized appropriations for fiscal years 1969-1971; (4) authorizes the Secretary to pay up to 50 percent of the costs of State programs to bring pipeline safety up to Federal standards; and (5) directs the Secretary to set up a 15-member Technical Pipeline Safety Standards Committee.

The amendments to the Natural Gas Pipeline Safety Act passed by the 93d Congress provide grants-in-aid of $1,800,000 for fiscal year 1975 and $2,500,000 for fiscal 1976 to aid in the pipeline safety programs in the several states. An additional appropriation of $2,000,000 for fiscal year 1975 and $2,850,000 for fiscal year 1976 was approved to carry out the provisions of the Act other than Federal grants-in-aid.

Daylight Savings Time (P.L. 93-182), approved December 15, 1973.—In order to save an estimated two percent of the fuel used for the generation of electricity, Congress placed the Nation on year-round daylight savings time until the last Sunday in April 1975. The switchover is to take place on January 6, 1974. It is estimated that the action will save an estimated equivalent of 150,000 barrels of oil a day during the winter months. Am radio stations allowed to operate only during daylight hours will be allowed to come on the air one hour in advance of local sunrise. The Act further provides for the Department of Transportation to study the energy conserved as a result of the move to daylight savings and to determine whether daylight savings should be extended after April 1975.

Daylight Savings Time (P.L. 93-434), approved October 5, 1974.—In response to the energy crisis experienced by the Nation in the winter months of 1973/1974, Congress adopted legislation creating year-round daylight savings time (PL 93-182) to save an estimated two percent of the fuel used for the generation of electricity. Congress passed a new measure which would exempt the months of November, December, January, and February from year-round daylight savings time. The Act also extends by one month, until July 31, 1975, the time given to the Secretary of Transportation to submit his final report to Congress on the effects of daylight savings time on energy consumption.

Federal Nonnuclear Research and Development Act (P.L. 93-577), approved December 31, 1974.—In order to harness energy sources not yet tapped, legislation was passed to provide for a concentrated nonnuclear research and development program emphasizing the exploitation of non-polluting energy sources such as oil shale, solar and geothermal energy, wind and tidal power, and hydrogen. Recycling solid wastes and developing more energy-efficient transportation systems are important aims of this program. Grants, loans and other incentives will be provided to business and academic institutions for development of programs and projects providing more efficient energy use and reducing waste in energy production. The Council on Environmental Quality and the Water Resources Council will bear the responsibility of analyzing the effect these programs will have on our existing resources and the environment. A total of $20 billion may be appropriated over a 10 year period for the implementation of this program.

Nuclear Energy Information Reports to Congress (P.L. 93-514, approved December 8, 1974)—Congress provided for the availability of additional nuclear energy information by passage of S. 3802 which amends the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 by requiring the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy to make annual reports to the Congress no later than June 30 of each year on the development, use, and control of nuclear energy for both defense and peaceful purposes. The reports will insure that all Members are adequately informed as to the developments in the field of nuclear energy, and they will assist the appropriate committees of Congress in the exercise of informed judgment on matters of weaponry, foreign policy, defense, international trade, and in respect to the expenditure and appropriation of Government revenues.

Atomic Energy Commission Authorizations, FY 1974 (P.L. 93-60, approved July 6, 1973)—Congress authorized a total of $2,469,755,000 for the Atomic Energy Commission for fiscal year 1974. The amount was $103,495,000 less than the Administration request. Increases over budget requests were authorized in the areas of uranium enrichment, civilian reactor programs, nuclear fusion and underground stimulation of nuclear gas. Major decreases were approved in the weapons program and in capital and equipment funding. The Atomic Energy Commission has the responsibility to protect the health and safety of the public, and to regulate the control and use of sources, by-products, and special nuclear materials. In addition, the Commission is charged with the responsibility to consider whether major actions in the development and conduct of AEC programs and in its licensing activities would be likely to result in a significant, adverse impact on the environment.

Atomic Energy Commission Authorizations, FY 1975 (P.L. 93-276, approved May 10, 1974)—For Fiscal Year 1975, Congress increased authorized appropriations for the Atomic Energy Commission by 45 percent over the Fiscal 1974 budget, from $2,469,755,000 to $3,677,433,000. Although part of this increase reflects the expanding budget for energy research, almost half of it is attributable to the growing costs of new and continuing construction projects. One amendment to the recommendations of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy was approved, authorizing an additional $600,000 to construct a solar heating and cooling demonstration project at the AEC laboratory in Los Alamos, New Mexico. In addition to the funds for solar energy research, the legislation provides $654.8 million for nuclear materials; $875.2 million for weapons research and testing; $371.5 million for civilian reactor research and development; $52.9 million for reactor safety research; $166.5 million for environmental and biomedical research and safety; $286.8 for physical research; $32.3 million for applied energy technology; and $161.5 million for naval reactor development. The separate authorization for plant and capital equipment was increased from $718.3 million in fiscal 1974 to $1,130,900 for Fiscal 1975.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Supplemental AEC Authorizations, FY 1975 (P.L. 93-576, approved December 31, 1974)—With the passage of H.R. 16609 providing supplemental appropriations for the Atomic Energy Commission, the House provided additional funds for weapons testing to accommodate the higher yield tests deemed necessary by the AEC before implementation of the Threshold Test Ban Treaty, scheduled to become effective March 31, 1976, and assured that there would be adequate funds for research and development programs aimed at developing safeguard techniques for the numerous processes involving the handling of special nuclear material. The House voted to authorize additional appropriations of $62,200,000 for operating expenses and $18,300,000 for plant and capital equipment.

The supplemental funds for the nuclear weapons program will support efforts by the AEC to initiate a significantly modified series of testing programs, and to help alleviate the effects which could result from the reduction to the weapons laboratories' advanced testing programs. Particularly strengthened will be weapons laboratories' efforts in such areas as materials and high explosives research.

Specifically regarding the supplemental funds for safeguards, the AEC had indicated that many of the studies of this area have concluded that the safeguards area of transportation, including related communications aspects, needed to be strengthened. These funds will upgrade the AEC's capability to protect nuclear materials in transit.

Deepwater Port Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-627, approved January 3, 1975)—Although Congress has enacted legislation establishing several programs aimed at making the United States energy independent, it also has recognized that the importation of crude oil will continue to be an important means of satisfying our country's energy needs. This legislation makes possible the construction of urgently needed deepwater port facilities, while at the same time protecting the public interest and the environment. It will enable our Nation to take full advantage of the savings available through the use of the very large supertankers for the transport of oil. Under the provisions of this act, deepwater port facilities will be licensed for construction and operation by the Secretary of Transportation with the approval of the Governor of the adjacent coastal State or States. There are procedures for evaluation and consideration of license applications, including environmental impact statements and public hearings. In addition, environmental review criteria are to be established for the evaluation of applications and such applications for licenses must be reviewed for their anti-trust implications. The Act also contains comprehensive provisions relating to the prevention and cleanup of oil spills and compensation for any pollution damage which might be caused by oil spills.

Energy Transportation Security Act of 1974 (H.R. 8193 pocket vetoed by the President, December 20, 1974)—In an effort to reduce the nearly complete dependence of the United States on foreign-flag vessels for its oil imports, the Congress approved a measure requiring that a percentage of certain liquid petroleum products be imported on U.S.-flag vessels. This action will assist in relieving the American dual dependence on foreign interests for both petroleum and the shipping thereof; obviously this is a measure which will increase our independence in meeting our energy needs and further protect our environment by requiring that a certain percentage of our oil be shipped in American flag vessels.

Specifically this Act will require that 20 percent of our petroleum imports go on U.S. flag vessels. This percentage would escalate to 25 percent after June 30, 1975 and to 30 percent after June 30, 1977. This legislation, in addition to maintaining the tanker capability of the U.S. to move our petroleum requirements will also result in a substantial balance of payments benefits to the United States at a time when this is of utmost importance. The bill excludes by specific provision in law those refineries whose total refinery capacity does not exceed 30,000 barrels per day. Such provision protects the small refiner in those contracts for foreign oil in which the supplier nation requires that the oil be shipped in vessels of its own flag. One important provision of this legislation designed to protect the environment of our shores establishes an antipollution construction standard of general applicability to all self-propelled vessels in excess of 70,000 deadweight tons, designed for the carriage of oil in bulk and documented under the laws of the United States, including vessels qualifying for cargo under this Act. All U.S. vessels of this category, if contracted for after December 31, 1975, must be constructed using the best available pollution prevention technology.

ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES

Surface Mining Control Act (S. 425 vetoed by the President December 30, 1974)—Surface mining surpassed deep mining in 1971 as the Nation's leading method of coal production. Since 1970, 850 deep mines have been closed. Strip mining is less costly, but without site reclamation, land is destroyed and surrounding bodies of water polluted. In an attempt to cope with the problem of the Nation's increasing need for coal for fuel and also with the obvious need to stabilize the environment, the Congress after careful consideration adopted this legislation to establish a nationwide program to prevent adverse effects to society and the environment from strip mining.

This legislation provides the basic standard that lands may not be surface mined unless they can be reclaimed and give the principal responsibility for surface mining regulation to the States, allowing them 30 months to prepare adequate regulatory programs to meet the minimum standards of the Act. Federal funding is available to help the States prepare and enforce such programs. In addition the legislation establishes a reclamation program to repair past damages from both surface and underground coal mines in all regions of the country. In order to pay for this program of reclamation for the next 10 years a fee of 35 cents per ton for surface mined coal and 25 cents per ton for underground mined coal or 10 percent of the value of such coal, whichever is less, will be assessed. The Act stipulates that one-half of this money must be spent in the State in which it is collected.

The Act also authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to establish State mining and mineral resources research institutes at State or other eligible universities with the hope that this will help avoid future materials and personnel shortages. In order to protect the surface owner of land where coal deposits have been reserved by the Federal Government, this legislation establishes as Federal coal leasing policy a requirement that the Secretary of the Interior not lease for surface mining without the consent of the surface owner. Federal coal deposits underlying land owned by a person who has his principal place of residence on the land, or personally farms or ranches the land affected by the mining operation, or receives directly a "significant portion" of his income from such farming.

The Act also provides for generous compensation to the surface owner, based not only upon the market value of the property of the land, but also the costs of dislocation and relocation, loss of income, and other values and damages. The procedure for obtaining surface owner consent is intended to assure that the surface owner will be dealing solely with the Secretary of the Interior.

Toxic Substances Control Act of 1973 (S. 426 passed the House July 23, 1973)—The House and Senate passed legislation giving the Environmental Protection Agency the power to control the sale and production of potentially harmful chemicals. Both bills contain provisions for citizen suits against alleged violators of the Toxic Substances Control Act. The House version authorizes the administrator of the EPA to require testing of certain chemical substances if necessary to protect health or the environment; directs the EPA administrator to identify and publish in the Federal Register a list of chemical substances which he finds could pose substantial danger to human health or the environment; prohibits the manufacture, for new use, of any existing chemical listed by the administrator as potentially dangerous unless at least 90 days prior to production the manufacturer submits test data to the administration showing the new use does not pose a danger to health or the environment; prohibits the manufacture and distribution of any new chemical listed by the administrator as potentially dangerous unless at least 90 days prior to production the manufacturer submits test data showing the substance poses no unreasonable risk to health or the environment; authorizes the administrator to require chemical producers to submit reports to him on manufactured chemicals; and establishes a 12-member Chemical Substances Board in the EPA to advise the administrator in carrying out provisions in the bill. The House version authorizes funds for fiscal 1974 through fiscal 1976.

Safe Drinking Water Act (P.L. 93-523, approved December 16, 1974)—Congress for the first time ever authorized the Federal government to establish minimum standards for the Nation's drinking water, authorizing appropriations of $156 million. Although the effective date for the development of final standards by the Environmental Protection Agency is four years after the bill's enactment, the standards 180 days after the bill becomes law. Agency is required to promulgate primary standards which will take effect eighteen months after enactment.

Furthermore the Agency is directed to contract with the National Academy of Science (NAS) for a study to determine the maximum allowable level of contaminants in drinking water. The NAS is required to report to Congress within two years after the bill becomes law. Pursuant to receiving this report, the Environmental Protection Agency is to develop appropriate standards.

Primary enforcement of the standards rests with State governments, and the Agency is empowered to bring suit against States not complying with the appropriate regulations. Furthermore, twenty-seven months after enactment, citizens can bring suit against the Agency and/or water systems operators in order to secure enforcement of the Act. The delay is designed to give local systems time to put the new standards into effect. Water systems operators too are required to notify their users of any violation of Agency regulations.

The Environmental Protection Agency is also authorized to act in time of drinking water emergencies by allocating treatment chemicals. In addition, the Agency is authorized to act as the grantor of loans of up to $50,000 to small public water systems. Finally, the Agency is directed to conduct a survey of chemicals that might cause cancer when used as treatment in drinking water.

Ocean Pollution Control (P.L. 93-119, approved October 4, 1973)—This Act seeks to curb discharges of oil from ocean-going vessels and to regulate oil tankers by implementing the 1969 and 1971 amendments to the 1954 Convention on the Prevention of Pollution of the Seas by Oil. The 1969 amendments to the convention deal with the routine discharge of oil from tankers and other ships arising principally from tank cleaning operations while at sea. The 1971 amendments were a first step at the international level toward developing tanker construction standards that will minimize the impact of spillage by limiting the volume of oil that may be carried in each cargo cell of the ship. Under present conditions, it is estimated that a total of almost one million metric tons of oil are discharged into the oceans each year from tank washings and oil blast discharges. Of this amount, U.S. registered tankers are estimated to contribute approximately 53,000 or about six percent of the total. This Act increases the penalties to provide a more realistic sanction for violators. The new penalties for oil spillage provide for a maximum fine of $10,000 and imprisonment for not more than one year for willful discharges in violation of the Act, a civil penalty of not more than $10,000 for either a willful or negligent discharge in violation of the Act and a civil penalty of not more than $5,000 for any other violation of the Act or regulation not amounting to a discharge. Under the present provisions, the maximum fine is $2,500 and no civil penalties are provided for. This legislation is an important step forward in our effort to reduce and eventually eliminate all intentional discharges.

Certain Ocean Dumping Prohibited (P.L. 93-254, approved March 22, 1974)—For many years this Nation and others have been almost completely indifferent to their treatment of one of the earth's primary resources, the oceans. In the last Congress, the 92nd, the House and Senate passed the Marine Protection, Research, and Sanctuaries Act in response to the growing concern over damage to the marine life of our coastal waters and an awareness of the problems in other countries relating to the dumping of deadly mercury compounds in coastal waters. This legislation brings conformity between the legislation of the 92nd Congress and the provisions of the Marine Pollution Convention, adopted in London in November 1972.

In addition to providing technical and conforming language between the earlier legislation and the Convention, the Act expands the definition of materials to be controlled to include oil which is taken on board for the purpose of dumping. It further imposes a duty upon the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency in carrying out his permit responsibility under the former act to include within his criteria those provisions of the Convention. However, he may not in any manner weaken the existing national requirements.

Marine Protection, Research and Sanctuaries Act Authorizations (P.L. 93-472, approved October 26, 1974)—This Act extends for one year, through fiscal year 1975, the appropriations authorized to implement title I of the Marine Protection, Research, and Sanctuaries Act of 1972, the so-called Ocean Dumping Act, controlling disposal of land-generated waste at sea. The extension makes it possible for the 94th Congress to conduct oversight hearings into the whole problem of ocean waste disposal while continuing the present program. It reflects a commitment both to America and to the international community for further protection of ocean waters and extends protective regulatory activities to U.S. ocean waters.

Coastal Zone Management Act Amendment (P.L. 93-612, approved January 2, 1975)—In order to improve administration of coastal zone management grants by the Department of Commerce, Congress amended the Act of 1972 to increase the authorization for program development grants from $9 million to $12 million in order to clear the way for an expected administration request for an additional $3 million in planning funds for this fiscal year. The Act also provides for removing the present 10-percent limitation on the amount an individual State can receive for administering a completed coastal zone program and replaces it with specific per year dollar limitations of $2 million for fiscal year 1975, $2.5 million for fiscal year 1976, and $3 million for fiscal year 1977.

Saline Water Program Authorization (P.L. 93-51, approved July 1, 1973)—Congress authorized $9.1 million to be spent on research development, construction and operation of saline water conversion test beds and facilities, construction and operation of saline water conversion modules, and administration and coordination of the program. Authorized by Congress in 1952 the saline water program is responsible for research into the conversion of brackish water and seawater into fresh water at costs that would be comparable to that of supplying natural fresh water.

Saline Water Conversion Extension (P.L. 93-342, approved July 10, 1974)—This Act extends the Saline Water Program Authorization Act of 1973 for fiscal 1975, and provides $14 million for research during that period, a substantial increase over earlier funding.

Water Resources Development Act (P.L. 93-251, approved March 7, 1974)—This bill replaces previous legislation that had been vetoed by the President in 1972, by providing for new ways of ensuring efficiency and economy in the construction of public works projects as well as innovative approaches to flood control and environmental problems. A total of $1.3 billion was authorized over fiscal 1974-79 for construction, repair, design, and development of navigation, flood control and other water resources projects.

Among innovative procedures included in the legislation are the institution of a new two-step authorization process for most types of water works projects. Under the process, after a project had been fully designed and studies for environmental impact, it must be reapproved by Congress for construction funding. In addition, projects authorized for longer than eight years, but never funded, would be automatically cancelled unless Congress objected. The measure also prohibits implementation of the Administration's interest rate formula for approving or disapproving all future water resources projects, without congressional approval. Instead, the bill gives the force of law to the formula established by the Water Resources Council in 1968. H.R. 10203 also includes an authorization for new pilot programs to control erosion along coastal and lake shorelines and streambanks and a provision providing for testing of flood control methods not requiring the use of physical structures.

Extension of Certain Authorizations of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act (P.L. 93-592, approved January 2, 1975)—This legislation extends the authority for four sections of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act which expired on June 30, 1974. These sections have been covered since the expiration date by a continuing resolution which would have expired when the 93rd Congress adjourned sine die. These four provisions authorize programs of research, training, and information, grants to State and interstate water pollution control agencies, and scholarships and training grants to colleges and universities. Also this Act provides for an additional authorization for the study being conducted by the National Commission on Water Quality. The Commission is charged with making a full and complete investigation and study of all of the technological aspects, and all aspects of the total economic, social, and environmental effects of achieving or not achieving the effluent limitations and goals of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act.

Water Resources Development Act (P.L. 93-251, approved March 7, 1974)—As an omnibus bill, incorporating the bulk of water resources development legislation, this Act effects several major policy changes and authorizes or modifies various Corps of Engineers projects, with provision (under the phase I design memorandum stage) for congressional review of several prior to the initiation of actual construction. Major demonstration programs for protection against streambank and shoreline erosion, for deauthorization of projects not receiving appropriations for an 8 year period, and for non-structural alternatives (flood proofing, evacuation, flood plain management, etc.) which may be utilized as all or part of flood control projects are among the provisions. Further, the interest rate for evaluating water resources is specified to be determined in the manner it had been previously (until changed by act of Congress). The interest rate had been raised administratively, making it more difficult to determine whether projects are economically feasible. A similar provision in a previous bill had resulted in a Presidential veto. The Water Resources Development Act of 1974 strengthens and extends an overall concern for the protection of a vital environmental resource.

National Sea Grant College Extension Act (P.L. 93-73, approved July 10, 1973)—In extending the National Sea Grant College in the Department of Commerce, Congress provided authorizations of $30 million, $40 million, and $50 million for fiscal years 1974, 1975, and 1976 respectively. Congress also authorized $200,000 for a study of the means of sharing, through cooperative programs with other nations, the results of marine research and provided the Secretary of Commerce with authority to make contracts and grants to participants for this purpose without matching share requirements.

Waste Treatment Fund Allocations (P.L. 93-243, approved January 2, 1974)—Acting in response to suggestions by States and the allocation formula for waste treatment funds under the Federal Water Pollution Control Act of 1972 be amended, Congress enacted a new formula in 1973. Prior to the passage of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act Amendments of 1972, water treatment funds were distributed to States on the basis of population. This formula was modified in 1972 in response to criticism that a population measure for allocation was not necessarily a good reflection of the actual "needs" of a State. The 1972 Act provided that funds be allocated based upon a "needs" survey which was conducted by the Environmental Protection Agency and required that a new survey be conducted every two years.

The Waste Treatment Fund Allocation Act of 1973 is designed to meet the criticisms of many States that the "needs" survey was not necessarily accurate, and that the allocation formula needed to be changed. The new formula provided in the Act will be used only for FY 1975 allotments, and requires that 50 percent of each State's share of the total allotment be based on the ratio of the individual State's total construction needs (based on the EPA survey) to the total of all States. The other 50 percent is to be based on the ratio of the costs of three specific categories of pollution control facilities (secondary treatment, tertiary treatment, and new interceptor sewers, force mains and pumping stations). In addition, the new formula stipulates that no State receive less than it received in FY 1972.

Clean Air Act Extension (P.L. 93-15, approved April 9, 1973)—In extending the Clean Air Act of 1970, Congress authorized $475 million for fiscal 1974 for air pollution and automobile emission control programs established under the Act. Included in the authorizations are $150 million for research on fuels and vehicles and $25 million for development of low-emission vehicles.

Clean Air Act Extension (P.L. 93-319, approved June 22, 1974)—The continuing effects of the petroleum shortages and the pre-eminent energy need have aggravated the problem of implementing the provisions of the Clean Air Act of 1970. Earlier proposals seeking to amend that Act were considered in extensive hearings affecting automobile emission control standards, allowable air quality deterioration, transportation control plans, and the impact on air quality of conversion to coal and of short-term suspensions of stationary source emission limitations. A bill including temporary suspension of emission and fuel limitations for power plants converting to coal, delays of statutory emission standards until 1978, and extension of auto emission standards to 1976 was vetoed by the President; nevertheless most of its provisions were embodied in the legislation finally passed, the Energy Supply and Environmental Coordination Act, permitting a temporary easing of environmental control standards during the present period of critical energy need. While thus recognizing the necessity for flexibility imposed by the Nation's industrial priorities, the new law also provides for reassessment of the situation by Congress in extending the $475 million funding-level to June of 1975. There will be careful scrutiny of the law's effects upon the level of air pollution and the development of control technology. Appropriations for fiscal 1974 totaled $172.8 million.

Solid Waste Disposal Act Extension (P.L. 93-14, approved April 9, 1973)—Congress also extended the Solid Waste Disposal Act of 1970, authorizing $238.5 million for fiscal 1974 for waste recycling programs funded under the 1970 Act. Included in the authorizations are $76 million for development of recycling and waste-disposal techniques, $140 million in grants for demonstration of resource-recovery systems and construction of waste-disposal facilities, and $22.5 million for research on disposal of mining wastes.

Solid Waste Disposal Authorizations (P.L. 93-611, approved January 2, 1975)—Under this legislation, the House extended for two years appropriations authorized by the Solid Waste Disposal Act for 1975 and 1976 at the levels provided for fiscal years 1973 and 1974. Refuse and solid waste disposal continues to be a major and urgent problem in the Nation's cities and towns. This extension makes it possible for the present program to continue its operations to help reduce municipal expenses, increase resource recovery, and improve solid waste practices. The problem of solid waste disposal represents a National expenditure second only to education and welfare in its magnitude and vitally important to the Nation's environmental health.

TVA Pollution Prevention Facilities (H.R. 11929 pocket vetoed by the President December 23, 1974)—This Act reflects the fact that the growing cost of environmental controls is detracting from the ability of the Tennessee Valley Authority to meet the goals and objectives set for TVA by Congress. The Authority was established by the Congress in 1933 as a multipurpose resource agency to work on conservation development, land use, and other conservation-related programs. Under terms of Federal legislation the Authority's power program is to be self supporting and a portion of the original Federal outlay is to be repaid by the Authority to the Federal government. However, the Tennessee Valley Authority, like other power producing systems, must comply with all of the environmental controls applicable to any other power system set forth in the Federal Water Pollution Control Act and the Clean Air Act. These programs require the expenditures of vast sums of money for expensive environmental controls equipment. The purpose of this legislation is to give the TVA credits against its Federal debt for a certain percentage of its expenditures relating to pollution control devices.

Expansion of Conservation and Rehabilitation Programs on Certain Lands (P.L. 93-452, approved October 18, 1974)—With the passage of H.R. 11537, the House and Senate acted affirmatively to extend the game conservation and rehabilitation programs presently carried out only on military reservations and to provide for the carrying out of such programs on certain other federally owned lands, namely, Bureau of Land Management lands within the Department of the Interior, National Forest Lands within the Department of Agriculture, Atomic Energy Commission lands, and National Aeronautics and Space Administration lands.

Much of the land covered by this Act has tremendous wildlife enhancement potential while other areas are important in the preservation of endangered and threatened species of fish and wildlife. Additionally, these areas throughout the United States provide our citizenry with a variety of recreational activities. Use of these is made by pleasure boaters, nature photographers, birdwatchers, amateur naturalists, and others in pursuit of high quality outdoor recreation.

Title I of H.R. 11537 authorized $1.5 million to carry out expanded recreational programs on military reservations. In addition, in order to assist the Secretary of the Interior in carrying out his functions and responsibilities under any cooperative agreements to which he is a party affecting these lands, this act authorized to be appropriated to him the sum of $2 million per year for a five-year period.

Title II of this act provides for the carrying out of the highly successful Sikes Act game conservation and rehabilitation program, formerly authorized only for military reservations, on other Federal lands throughout the United States. Title II of the act covers $450 million acres of Bureau of Land Management lands, 187 million acres of national forest lands, 2 million acres of Atomic Energy Commission lands, and many thousands of acres of NASA lands.

Appropriations Ceiling Increases for National Park System (P.L. 93-477, approved October 26, 1974)—Congress provided for increases in the appropriation ceilings for and boundary changes in certain units of the national park system, as well as authorizing appropriations for land acquisition in that system. It represents a step forward toward the objectives of the National Park System. As an omnibus bill, it was the product of 19 separate proposals, many of which involved full legislative hearings. Appropriations for selected land acquisition will be made from the land and water conservation fund set aside by the Congress to serve the Nation's recreational needs. The additional funding and boundary changes affecting 15 units in the national park system reflect continuing National concern with improvement and expansion of that system for the benefit of all our people.

Wild and Scenic Rivers Amendment (P.L. 93-261, approved January 3, 1975)—This proposed amendment to the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act of 1968 authorizes a study of thirteen rivers or river segments for their potential value as wild, scenic, or recreational areas. Recommendations regarding them will be submitted to the Congress within approximately four years of the bill's enactment. The purpose of this legislation is to further the goals of the wild and scenic rivers system, preserving some of the Nation's most beautiful heritage for further generations. A proper course of action can be determined once adequate and serious study is given the river areas covered by the bill.

National Wildlife Refuge System Administration (P.L. 93-509, approved December 3, 1974)—The National Wildlife Refuge System Administration Act Amendment of 1974 amends the 1956 law by requiring payment of a fair market value for right-of-way or other interests granted in connection with the purpose of the Wildlife Refuge System. Vetoed by the President in its original form (H.R. 11541), it was rewritten and subsequently passed in both houses. In providing for the replacement of lands used for roads, canals, pipelines, and the like, this amendment seeks to preserve wildlife refuge lands during this period of intensified energy development. Receipts from the right-of-way grants will be used for continuing land acquisition in wildlife refuges.

Forest and Rangeland Renewal Resources Planning Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-378, approved August 17, 1974)—This Act establishes more long-range planning for the National Forest System, and congressional control over management of the National Forest System lands. Under its provisions, the Administration is required to prepare a national renewable resource assessment of all such lands and resources and a Forest service renewable resource program. Both the assessment and the program must be submitted to Congress for review. The estimated cost over the next five years for implementing this Act is $4.9 million.

The legislation provides purposeful direction for development and management of the National Forest System, promoting coordination of both the commodity and amenity resources and uses of that system. The renewable resources program, to be prepared under the terms of the Act, will be the most comprehensive and coordinated situation review and action programs ever prepared for either the national forests or the associated work of the Forest Service in cooperative programs and research. Provisions have been made for alternative programs. Development of the renewable resources program will be in accordance with the principles set forth in the Multiple Use-Sustained Yield Act of 1960 and the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969.

User Fees in Recreational Facilities (P.L. 93-81, approved August 1, 1973)—This Act specifies those kinds of outdoor recreational facilities at which Federal agencies may charge user fees. It amends the Flood Control Act of 1968 to allow for the collection of fees for the use of highly developed Federal outdoor recreation facilities. The Act does not allow for fees to be charged for daily use of water areas, lightly developed shoreland or boat-launching ramps where no mechanical or hydraulic equipment is provided.

Youth Conservation Corps Act (P.L. 93-408, approved September 3, 1974)—In the Second Session, Congress passed S. 1871, amending the Youth Conservation Corps Act of 1972 by expanding the Youth Conservation Corps (YCC) and by establishing it as a permanent agency in the Department of the Interior and the Department of Agriculture. The Corps serves two purposes. First, it enables young people to benefit by the experience of doing work—hard, outdoor work—that offers a sense of accomplishment, and of doing work for which they are paid. Second, the work done by YCC members has, in the words of the Act, "developed, enhanced, and maintained the natural resources of the United States" and may be expected to do so in the future. The Act establishes the Youth Conservation Corps in the Department of the Interior and the Department of Agriculture. The YCC is to be composed of young men and women from all socio-economic backgrounds and races who are 15 to 18 years old and are permanent residents of the United States, its territories and possessions, or Puerto Rico. They are to receive fair compensation and no member is to work more than ninety days in any year.

The Secretaries of the Interior and Agriculture are to determine areas within their own jurisdictions—and, in consultation with other Federal agencies, areas under the jurisdiction of these agencies—which are appropriate for Corps projects and are to plan work and education programs in such areas. The two Secretaries have authority to determine pay, hours, and other conditions of work for YCC members, who are not covered by Civil Service laws and regulations.

The Secretaries of the Interior and of Agriculture may make grants amounting to a maximum of 90 percent of the cost of any project to States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands and American Samoa for programs similar to those of the Youth Conservation Corps designed to develop and maintain non-Federal public lands and waters. The Act sets an appropriation ceiling of $60 million for each fiscal year, with the proviso that any unspent funds shall remain available until the end of the following fiscal year.

National Flood Insurance (P.L. 93-234, approved December 31, 1973)—As passed by Congress, P.L. 93-234 increases coverage limits under the Federal insurance program and requires communities designated as flood-prone areas to participate in the program. The Act amends the National Flood Insurance Act of 1968 to raise the limit on the amount of Federal flood insurance coverage that could be outstanding at any one time to $10 billion, from the existing $6 billion level, and greatly increases coverage available for residential and non-residential structures and their contents. Communities identified by the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development as flood-prone areas are required to participate in the flood insurance program or face withholding of certain Federal funding. Priority consideration is to be given to the establishment and maintenance of conservation areas in the formulation of land use and control measures under the flood insurance program. In addition, the Secretary of HUD is required to establish procedures for consultation with elected community officials in notifying and identifying flood-prone areas and applying criteria for land management and use. The governing body of any community which is adversely affected by a final determination by the Secretary under the bill or the 1968 Act may appeal the determination to a U.S. District Court within 60 days after receipt of notice of the determination.

Endangered Species (P.L. 93-205, approved December 28, 1973)—Both Houses have passed legislation to extend existing protections of fish and wildlife to species that were likely to become endangered in the foreseeable future as well as those in immediate danger of extinction. The Act extends protection to animals which were having trouble surviving in any significant portion of their habitat, rather than only those facing extinction; make it a Federal offense to import or export endangered species, to transport such species within the United States, upon its territorial waters or upon the high seas, to possess, sell transport or receive species in violation of the Act, to deliver, sell, receive, or transport endangered species or products made from them in interstate or foreign commerce, or to trade or possess specimens contrary to the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora signed on March 3, 1973. In addition, the act also provides civil penalties for each violation of the Act and a fine or imprisonment or both for willful violation of the Act. It permits States to enact laws which are more restrictive than the provisions of the Act. Funds were authorized to implement the Act for fiscal 1974 through fiscal 1976.

Anadromous Fish Conservation Act Amendments (P.L. 93-362, approved July 30, 1974)—In mid 1974, Congress reaffirmed and extended its commitment to support a Federal-State program designed to provide for the conservation, development, and enhancement of our Nation's supply of salt water and Great Lakes fish who ascend streams and rivers to spawn. The Anadromous Fish Conservation Act was first passed in 1966 to provide assistance to States for the construction of fish passages around dams, and programs to insure clean water for spawning and rearing young fish. Congress extended the termination date of the program from June 30, 1974 to June 30, 1979 and increased the appropriations authorized in the act from $10,000,000 per year to $20,000,000 per year. The Federal matching contribution percentage was increased from 60% to 66 2/3% of the total Federal-State allotment, and authority was also given in the act to use funds for the control of the sea lamprey.

Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Act Amendment (P.L. 93-339, approved July 10, 1974)—P.L. 93-339 amends the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Act of 1950 to permit U.S. participation in international enforcement of fish conservation in additional geographical areas, pursuant to the International Convention for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries. Extending the ICNAF's zone for fish conservation southward from Rhode Island to Cape Hatteras, North Carolina to take into account the migratory movement of certain species of fish is intended to enable better conservation of fish stocks along the Atlantic coast.

Colorado Basin Bill (P.L. 93-320, approved June 20, 1974)—In order to settle a troublesome issue in our relations with Mexico, this Congress passed provisions to regulate the salinity content of water flowing into Mexico in the Colorado River. Water pledged to Mexico under a 1944 treaty had been becoming increasingly saline due to its use and reuse in the 1400 miles it travels through seven States before reaching Mexico. Since 1961, the increase in the saline levels had prompted the Mexican government to press for a revised agreement to cover the quality of the water in the lower river which affects almost 10 million persons and 1 million acres of irrigated land. President Nixon and President Luis Echeverria of Mexico approved an agreement on water quality on August 30, 1973, which would limit salinity of the water going into Mexico to not more than 115 parts per million parts. This bill implements this pledge made by the President by authorizing the construction of a desalting plant near the Mexican-American border and the lining of about 49 miles of the Coachella Canal to reduce water losses.

Wild and Scenic Rivers System Act (S. 921 passed the House December 3, 1973)—The House passed legislation amending the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act of 1968 to prohibit, for an additional five years (until 1978), the licensing and construction of all potentially dangerous water resource projects on designated waterways and adjacent land areas, which have been included or are under study for inclusion in the wild and scenic rivers system. The House version would authorize a maximum funding ceiling for land acquisition at existing units in the system and set an expiration date at the end of fiscal year 1978. The bill would require the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture (when national forest land is involved) to notify Congress 180 days prior to publication in the Federal Register of a decision that a river is unsuitable for inclusion in the system. This provision allows Congress sufficient time to review such findings before any activities which might carry adverse effects to the water are initiated. The bill would also broaden the definition of scenic easements to include lands which contribute to the wild and scenic quality of the designated river. The 1968 Act was enacted to save the few remaining free-flowing rivers and their immediate environment from pollution and commercialism. The Act designated segments of eight rivers as initial components of the system, and also named twenty-seven additional rivers for study for possible inclusion. These rivers are a part of the national wild and scenic rivers system and are maintained and administered by appropriate Federal and State agencies, in such a manner that enhances and protects their scenic, historic, and recreational values. The Act also placed a five year moratorium on all Federal agencies with regard to the licensing and construction of any water resource project which might adversely affect the water or immediate environment of the selected rivers.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

Federal Employees Annuity Increase (P.L. 93-136, approved October 24, 1973)—Retired Federal Government workers and postal employees will receive a 5.5 percent annuity increase effective January 1, 1974 to be reflected in their February annuity checks due on the .8 percent increase in October's consumer price index. The new CPI base figure is 136.6. In order to trigger the next annuity increase, it would have to rise to 140.7, the minimum 3 percent increase required by law. For the first time Federal and postal employees will no longer be required to retire before the date of the increase to get the raise. Under the recently enacted deferred annuity law, employees who retire after the date of an annuity raise will receive at least as great an annuity as if they had retired before the date of the increase.

Federal Employees Health Programs (P.L. 93-246, approved January 31, 1974)—Congress approved a compromise health insurance bill for Government workers that increases the Government contribution to employees' health care plans from the present 40 percent contribution to 50 percent in 1974 and 60 percent in 1975. The legislation requires the health insurance companies to comply with Civil Service Commission rulings in case of disputed claims filed by Federal and postal workers. Previously, employees who were dissatisfied with the way their health insurance claims had been settled had little chance of getting the matter adjudicated.

Federal Employees Leave (P.L. 93-181, approved December 14, 1973)—Congress gave final approval to legislation liberalizing Federal employee use of annual leave. The Act gives employees cash for the unused leave they earn during the year they leave the Government, and protects their annual leave against loss as a result of administrative error or because work exigencies prevent their using it.

Minimum Federal Annuity (P.L. 92-273, approved April 26, 1974)—Congress acted to equalize the Federal annuity payments with those provided to persons who receive pensions under the social security system. The new minimum rate will be coupled with automatic cost of living increases. It also provides for an extra $240 per year to the pensions of Federal retirees who left the Federal Service prior to October 1, 1969. As passed, however, the Act does not apply to retirees from the Federal Civil Service who currently receive Social Security or Veterans' pensions.

Postal Service Retirement Contributions (P.L. 93-349, approved July 12, 1974)—Under the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970, postal employees negotiate for increases in salaries and benefits. It was determined that the Postal Service was not required by that law to contribute to the Civil Service Retirement Fund sums of money which would reflect the agency's contribution correspondent with increased benefits. This act provides for payments by the Postal Service to the Civil Service Retirement Fund for increases in the unfunded liability of the fund due to increases in benefits for Postal Service employees.

Elimination of Survivor Annuity Reductions (P.L. 93-474, approved October 28, 1974)—As S. 628 cleared the Congress, a Federal retiree would not have his annuity reduced for survivor benefits during months in which he was not married. At the present time there is an annuity reduction for a retiree, if he so elects, in order to provide an annuity to his spouse upon his death. However, if the spouse pre-deceases the annuitant the reduced annuity is maintained.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Mandatory Retirement Age (H.R. 3798 passed the House April 16, 1973)—The bill would amend 5 U.S.C. §335 to require mandatory separation from the Federal Service at the time an employee reaches 70 years of age and has completed five years of service. At the present time the age requirement is 70 years, but the service time requirement is fifteen years.

Employee Retirement Contributions Adjusted (H.R. 9257 passed the House October 1, 1973)—Studies have revealed that employees are contributing more into the Civil Service Retirement Fund than is required to meet the current demands on the fund. The bill, as passed by the House, would allow for fund and for a further adjustment in the rate dependent on demands on the fund.

Federal Employees' Compensation Act Amendments (P.L. 93-416, approved September 7, 1974)—This Act provides workers' compensation benefits for Federal employees injured or killed in the course of performing their jobs. Eight years had passed since the previous major amendments to the Federal Employees Compensation Act had been enacted. Congress felt that the social and economic changes which had developed during that time demanded a careful study of the provisions for Federal workmen's compensation. The amendments provide for improved protection against rising medical and living costs for Federal employees and their survivors who receive benefits. The amendments guarantee reemployment rights, within certain time limitations, at the same or an equivalent position upon recovery. The amendments also increase the compensation benefits for survivors.

Federal Employees' Per Diem (S. 3341 vetoed by President January 2, 1975)—Hearings on the issue of travel allowances and per diem rates for Federal employees demonstrated that many employees are required to pay for some food and housing from personal funds while in a travel status because the current per diem and mileage allowances are not adequate. The Congress, therefore, acted to increase those allowances. The Act provides that the General Services Administration, the agency charged with promulgating travel regulations, be authorized to issue regulations which allow expenditures of government funds for travel up to certain maximums. The domestic per diem rate may be set at a maximum of $35 as opposed to the current maximum of $25. For travel outside the continental United States, the per diem allowance will be established for each locality where an employee is assigned temporary duty. Under special circumstances the domestic maximum may be set at $50 per diem and non-domestic travel be allowed $21 per diem in addition to the amount set according to locality.

The mileage allowances may be set with minimum and maximum ranges of from $.08 to $.11 a mile for use of privately owned motor cycles; from $.15 to $.20 a mile for use of privately owned automobiles; and from $.18 to $.24 a mile for use of privately owned airplanes. The employees may also be reimbursed for parking fees, ferry fees, bridge, road, and tunnel costs and airplane landing and tie-down fees. The law previously did not allow payment of airplane landing and tie-down fees.

The General Services Administration is required to confer with the Comptroller General of the United States, the Secretary of Transportation, the Secretary of Defense and representatives of employee organizations to make periodic studies of travel costs and to report annually to Congress.

The Act provides that per diem and mileage reimbursements for disabled veterans, entitled to such, be at the same rates as those set for Government employees.

Federal Employee and Executive Pay Increases—During the course of the 93rd Congress, Members were required to consider three important salary proposals for Federal employees and executives. In February 1974 (under the provisions of P.L. 90-207, approved December 16, 1967) the President submitted his recommendations for salary increases for top officials in the Executive, Legislative and Judicial branches. These increases would have affected all positions on the Executive Salary Schedule, all Federal judges and Members of Congress. The increases would have gone into effect unless either chamber of Congress acted to disapprove them. Hearings were held and resolutions of disapproval were introduced in both Houses. The Senate passed a resolution of disapproval (S. Res. 293, passed March 6, 1974) and the proposal was killed.

Under the provisions of P.L. 91-656 (approved January 8, 1971) there will be an adjustment in Federal General Schedule and related salaries each October 1st, unless the President submits an alternate plan in which he sets forth a proposal to eliminate or delay the adjustment due to national economic exigencies. In 1973 and in 1974 alternate plans were submitted to the Congress which would have delayed the adjustments by several months. If either house disapproved the plans, the adjustments would go into effect as scheduled in the law. In both instances enough members of Congress were of the opinion that inflation must be fought on broader ground than just Federal employees' salaries and that those salaries must be kept at a level where the employees would not suffer unduly because of increases in the cost of living. Both plans were disapproved (S. Res. 171 passed the Senate September 28, 1973. S. Res. 394 passed the Senate September 19, 1974).

FOREIGN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

Vietnam Bombing Halt (P.L. 93-52, approved July 1, 1973)—In a major congressional initiative, Congress voted to halt United States bombing in Cambodia, effective August 15, ending the U.S. combat role in Southeast Asia. The amendment to the Continuing Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1973 bars the use of any past, present or future appropriations to support combat activities in or over not only Cambodia, but Laos, North Vietnam and South Vietnam after the deadline date. The Act prohibits any funds appropriated under it to be used to provide assistance in the reconstruction or rehabilitation of North Vietnam. Similar provisions were approved by Congress as an amendment to the Second Supplemental Appropriations Act for fiscal 1973 (P.L. 93-50). Earlier this year, the President vetoed the original Second Supplemental Appropriations Act for fiscal 1973 (H.R. 7447) which contained a provision cutting off immediately all funds for combat activity in Cambodia and Laos.

Foreign Aid Authorization for Fiscal Year 1974 (P.L. 93-189, approved December 17, 1973)—For foreign military aid for fiscal 1974, Congress approved an authorization of $962.5 million for military assistance and $1,429.7 million for economic assistance, including $504 million in postwar aid to South Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia. The Act authorizes $300 million in military sales credits for Israel and grants the Department of Defense authority to borrow up to $200 million worth of munitions from its stockpile for aid to Cambodia. The total figure for foreign aid of $2,392,234,000 represents an amount nearly $400 million less than the Administration's request. The largest cut was in the Administration's military aid request. Conferees approved provisions which bar aid to countries expropriating U.S. property until

U.S. claims are settled (but giving authority for a presidential waiver) and which cut aid to Portugal, if such aid is used for Portuguese military operations in Africa.

Foreign Aid Authorization for Fiscal Year 1975 (P.L. 93-559, approved December 30, 1974)—Congress passed a foreign aid bill for fiscal year 1975 authorizing the expenditure of $2.89 billion. This represented a cut of almost $555 million from the amount requested by the Ford Administration. The bill was composed of numerous provisions and amendments restricting U.S. aid for certain purposes, thereby reflecting policy views of the Congress. A chief provision orders an immediate military aid cutoff to Turkey until substantial progress is made toward resolving the Cyprus question, but the President is permitted to delay the cutoff until February 5, 1975 if he considers it to be in the interest of the negotiations. Turkey may receive aid until the date provided that it obeys the Cyprus ceasefire and refrains from sending more troops or armaments to that island. The foreign aid package reflected much interest in the Middle East situation, with over one billion dollars authorized for that region. Israel receives the bulk of the assistance, $325 million in economic aid and $300 million in military sales. Egypt would receive $250 million in economic aid, and a special fund of $100 million was established with aid to Syria possible if it removes barriers to the emigration of Jews. In response to the recent expulsion of Israel from UNESCO, the United States would be prohibited from making further contributions to that organization until it takes action to correct recent political decisions. In another world trouble spot, Indochina, $617 million was authorized for postwar reconstruction of which $449.9 million was allocated for South Vietnam, $100 million for Cambodia, and $40 million for Laos. These funds are prohibited from being transferred to military programs. A total aid ceiling of $377 million was established for Cambodia with a subceiling of $200 million for military aid, and a ceiling of $70 million was created for all aid to Laos with a subceiling of $30 million for military aid. Assistance to South Korea was limited to $145 million, with the provision that it could be increased by $20 million if the President certified to Congress that human rights were being expanded there. This was a reaction to the authoritarian practices which have recently come to light under President Park Chung Hee's regime. Other provisions of the foreign aid package include a $25 million limit on aid to Chile, none of which can be used for military purposes, a limit on funds which can be used by the Central Intelligence Agency, and an allocation of $25 million to aid refugees from Cyprus. The bill includes $600 for the military assistance program, a cut of $385 million from the Administration request, and $500 million for food and nutrition programs.

Cut-off of Military Aid to Turkey (P.L. 93-448, approved October 17, 1974)—Congress reached agreement with the President on H.J. Res. 1167 on a restriction of U.S. Military aid to Turkey, following two Presidential vetoes of similar measures. The House and Senate both passed the continuing appropriations resolution for fiscal year 1975, with the Turkey provision included therein. Under the language agreed to, all military assistance to the Turkish Government is to be halted after December 10, 1974 until the President determines that substantial progress has been made toward achieving a resolution of the Cyprus situation and that Turkey is in compliance with the Foreign Military Sales Act of 1961 and the Foreign Military Sales Act. All such aid would stop immediately if Turkey violates the cease-fire on Cyprus, increases its forces on Cyprus, or ships any U.S. armaments to the island. The President was given the authority to suspend the aid cut-off if he determines that such a suspension would further the chances for a negotiated settlement. The ban resulted from charges that Turkey had violated the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Foreign Military Sales Act which prohibit the use of any U.S. military equipment in offensive actions. It was also maintained that the continued supply of U.S. armaments was detrimental to the ultimate goal of bringing about a negotiated settlement over Cyprus.

Nuclear Agreement Controls (P.L. 93-485, approved October 26, 1974)—Congress passed legislation this session to provide itself with veto power over international agreements regarding certain nuclear technology. Under this Act, as signed by the President, any international agreement on peaceful uses of nuclear technology involving reactors producing more than five thermal megawatts must be submitted to the Congress and referred to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. The Joint Committee would have thirty days in which to submit a report to Congress and to propose a concurrent resolution approving or disapproving the agreement in question. Following the initial thirty days, the concurrent resolution would have thirty days in which to be approved or disapproved, and if a concurrent resolution disfavoring the agreement is passed, the agreement would be nullified. This legislation was prompted by President Nixon's offer in June to sell nuclear reactors to Israel and Egypt for peaceful purposes.

Upon examining existing laws, the Joint Committee determined that there is no law currently prohibiting such agreements, and the legislation under consideration was seen as another indication of Congress' insistence on a voice in foreign affairs.

Liability for Nuclear Incidents Involving U.S. Warships (P.L. 93-513, approved December 6, 1974)—Congress gave final clearance in the Second Session to a bill assuming liability by the United States for nuclear incidents involving U.S. nuclear warships. The legislation authorizes the President to make reparations for bodily injury or death and property damage in the event that such an accident occurs, provided that it not be the result of armed combat or civil insurrection. Money for reparations would come from Defense Department contingency funds or, if necessary, from specific congressional authorization. The intent of this action was to facilitate the entry of U.S. nuclear warships into foreign ports by alleviating the concerns of the host nations for the possible effects of a nuclear accident. Although there has never been an accident involving naval reactors, of which 127 are in existence today, the assumption of absolute liability by the U.S. was seen as consistent with our policy in related matters. The Atomic Energy Act already contains provisions for strict or absolute liability for accidents involving commercial reactors, as in the case of the Savannah, the first nuclear powered merchant ship. The measure was expected to make it easier for the U.S. to negotiate visits by nuclear warships to foreign ports, such as in the ongoing renegotiation of the Spanish Base Agreement.

Military Procurement Authorization for Fiscal 1974 (P.L. 93-155, approved November 16, 1973)—For military weapons procurement and research and development of weapons systems, Congress authorized $21,299,520,000 for fiscal year 1974, $660 million less than the Administration requested. Included in the authorizations were funds for procurement of aircraft, missiles, naval vessels, tracked combat vehicles, torpedoes, and other weapons. For research and development a total of $8,194,885,000 was authorized. The Act also authorized an active duty force of 2,232,902 persons, a reduction of 43,000 from the present level of 2,289,000. A reserve force of 924,065 persons was authorized. A prohibition was placed on the spending of any funds for deployment or construction of any anti-ballistic missile system other than at Grand Forks, North Dakota. The Act contains a provision directing the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare to take all necessary steps to ensure continued inpatient services at eight public health service hospitals throughout the country which the Administration had attempted to phase out. The President vetoed legislation containing funds for the hospitals on August 1 of this year.

Military Procurement Authorization for Fiscal 1975 (P.L. 93-365, approved August 6, 1974)—During the Second Session, Congress authorized a total of $22,159,364,000 for military procurement, research and development for fiscal year 1975, a cut of $970,775,000 from the amount requested by the Nixon Administration. Almost $13 billion was allocated for weapons procurement, and the remaining $9 billion for research and development. The Act includes a ceiling of $1 billion on military aid to the forces of South Vietnam, $600,000,000 less than the amount requested by the Defense Department. Furthermore, a prohibition was placed on any funds to the South Vietnamese for actions designed to assist the Governments of Cambodia or Laos. Another major component of the military procurement package was the authorization for the Secretary of Defense to recommend a denial of exports to any Soviet-bloc nation of goods or technology developed as a result of Defense programs. This provision would affect the Soviet Union, Poland, Romania, Hungary, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, and East Germany and is designed to insure that none of these nations will improve its own military capabilities as a result of America's defense programs. Under the procedures outlined, the Secretary of Defense can request of the President a denial of certain applications for exports. If the President disagrees with the Secretary, he is required to submit both of their views to the Congress, which can, within sixty days, adopt a concurrent resolution disapproving the export application.

Military Construction Authorization for Fiscal 1974 (P.L. 93-168, approved November 29, 1973)—Congress cleared an authorization of $2,773,584,000 for military construction projects in the United States and overseas for fiscal 1974. The amount approved was $218,929,999 below the Defense Department request of $2,992,513,000. The largest single program authorization was for military family housing with an authorization of $1,179,039,000. The average ceiling cost of a family housing unit was increased by Congress from $24,000 to $27,500 in the United States and $33,500 to $38,000 outside the country. In addition to family housing authorizations, the Act contains construction authorizations for the Army, Navy, Air Force, Defense Agencies and Reserve Forces for fiscal 1974. Congress also approved a $12 million authorization for transfer of the Navy's weapons testing range from the Puerto Rican island of Culebra to two uninhabited islands nearby.

Military Construction Authorization for Fiscal 1975 (P.L. 93-552, approved December 27, 1974)—Congress passed a military construction bill which authorizes the expenditure of $2,984,378 during fiscal year 1975, a cut of $347,400,000 from the amount requested by the Administration. The most controversial issue in the legislation was the inclusion of funds for the expansion of the Navy's communication station on Diego Garcia, a British-owned island in the Indian Ocean. Supporters of the Diego Garcia funding saw it as an important indication of the U.S. presence in that region, whereas critics feared that increased activity there could be misinterpreted by the Soviet Union as a threat to its sphere of influence. A total of $14,802,000 was authorized for expansion of the Diego Garcia Facility, about half of the Administration's request. However, a provision was included to prohibit these funds from being allocated until the President certified in writing that the expansion was in the vital interests of the United States. Within 60 days following such a certification, either house of Congress could nullify the authorization by voting its disapproval. The funds authorized for Diego Garcia were later deleted from the military construction appropriations bill, but the President was given the option of seeking a new authorization in the next Congress if he deemed it in the U.S. national interest.

State Department Authorization (P.L. 93-126, approved October 18, 1973)—Another congressional protest over the manner in which this Administration handled U.S. involvement in the Indochina War is embodied in P.L. 93-126. It requires prior congressional authorization for use on or after August 15, 1973, of any funds "heretofore or hereafter appropriated" to finance the involvement of U.S. armed forces in hostilities in, over or from off the shores of North Vietnam, South Vietnam, Laos or Cambodia. Congress also barred the use of funds "heretofore or hereafter appropriated" for aid to North Vietnam unless specifically authorized by Congress. The two prohibitions were approved as amendments to this year's State Department Authorization Act which authorizes $682 million for fiscal 1974. In an attempt to curb the practice of rewarding campaign contributors with top diplomatic posts in other countries, Congress required in this legislation that any person nominated by the President for ambassador or minister must disclose at the time of his nomination all political contributions and those of his immediate family for the period from the first day of the fourth calendar year preceding the year of the nomination and ending on the date of his nomination.

USIA Authorization (P.L. 93-188, approved November 29, 1973)—Congress cleared an authorization of $215,614,000 for the U.S. Information Agency in fiscal 1974 after a Presidential veto of a similar bill (S. 1317) on October 23. The original bill contained an access-to-information clause, directed at expanding congressional access to USIA documents. The provision would have required a cutoff of funds for the USIA if the agency failed to respond within 35 days to a written request of either the House Foreign Affairs or the Senate Foreign Relations Committees for documents or other information relating to the agency. In vetoing this bill the President claimed that the access-to-information provision was an unconstitutional encroachment on executive prerogatives. The new bill bars the use of any appropriation for programs not yet authorized or any appropriations above the amount authorized, but makes this provision non-applicable to funds subsequently authorized or to funds made available through the fiscal 1974 continuing funding resolution.

State Department—United States Information Agency Fiscal 1975 Authorization (P.L. 93-475, approved October 26, 1974)—For Fiscal Year 1975, Congress authorized an expenditure of $741,901,000 for the State Department's operations and programs and $239,538,000 for the United States Information Agency. The figure for the State Department is $62,123,000 less than the Administration requested. In response to increased terrorist activities against foreign service personnel, Congress authorized the payment of a gratuity to the surviving dependent of any Foreign Service employee killed in the line of duty in the amount of one year's salary of the deceased. This provision was made retroactive to January 1, 1973 and would be applicable to the six persons who died under those circumstances between January 1, 1973 and August 1974. Included in this legislation is $40,000,000 to aid in the resettlement of Jews emigrating from the Soviet Union. This ac-represents a continuation of U.S. policy during the past two years, when $86,500,000 was appropriated for this purpose.

The authorization Act also repeals the Formosa Resolution of 1955 which authorized the President to send U.S. Forces to the defense of Formosa, the Pescadores and related territory in the area. This provision was seen as an indication of congressional efforts to place limits on U.S. commitments abroad. Another provision requires that nominees for ambassadorial posts must have listed in the Congressional Record reports on political contributions they have made, in order to try to separate political considerations from such appointments. Finally, it was declared the sense of Congress that U.S. civilian and military personnel overseas be reduced and that a five-year plan on future U.S. aid to South Vietnam be submitted to Congress for consideration.

Israel Emergency Assistance (P.L. 93-199, approved December 26, 1973)—In order to assist Israel to replace military equipment used during the recent Mideast war between Israel and the Arab states, Congress voted $2.2 billion in aid. The assistance authorization was attached to the Foreign Aid Appropriations Act for fiscal 1974, and agreed to after the House rejected an effort to cut from the bill $20 million in military credit sales for Saudi Arabia. The purpose of the emergency assistance measure is to help maintain a military balance necessary for the achievement of peace in the Middle East through authorizing funds in emergency security assistance to Israel. The legislation places certain restrictions on the use of assistance in excess of $1.5 billion. Prior to the obligation or expenditure of such assistance the President will be required to make a determination that the aid is needed, and he must report to the Congress at least 20 days prior to the date on which funds are obligated. Congress also authorized the President to use such sums as may be necessary from the amounts authorized in the bill, for payment of the U.S. share of the expense of the United Nations Emergency Force in the Middle East. The legislation directs the Secretary of Defense to conduct a study of the 1973 Arab-Israeli conflict to ascertain the effectiveness of the foreign military assistance program as it related to the Mideast conflict and to report to Congress no later than December 31, 1974. The President is authorized, at any time prior to June 30, 1974, to release Israel from its contractual liability to pay for defense articles and services purchased or financed under the Foreign Military Sales Act during the period from October 6, 1973 through June 30, 1974 and to apply the funds approved in this Act to those contracts.

Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty (P.L. 93-129, approved October 1, 1973)—For fiscal 1974, Congress authorized appropriations of $50,209,000 for operation of Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty. The Act creates a new seven-member Board for International Broadcasting to make grants to the stations and to oversee their operations, a duty previously performed by the Department of State. The Board had been recommended by a presidential commission set up to study alternative methods of financing the two radio systems.

Coast Guard Authorizations, Fiscal 1974 (P.L. 93-65, approved July 9, 1973)—For Fiscal Year 1974 Congress authorized appropriations for the Coast Guard totaling $109,239,000 for procurement and renovation of vessels, for aircraft, and for construction. A maximum number of active duty personnel was set at 37,607. The authorization provides $23,979,000 for the procurement and renovation of vessels and $75,260,000 for construction. In addition, there are special authorizations of $3,000,000 for the procurement of a long range search and rescue helicopter and $7,000,000 for payments to bridge owners for alteration of railroad and public highway bridges to permit navigation.

Coast Guard Authorizations, Fiscal 1975 (P.L. 93-430, approved October 1, 1974)—Fiscal Year 1975 authorizations for the Coast Guard include $22,676,000 for the procurement and renovation of vessels, including pollution control equipment for Coast Guard vessels; $17,793,000 for procurement of eight medium-range search aircraft; and $74,731,000 for construction and development of installations and facilities. Maximum active duty strength was raised from 37,607 to 37,748. The Act also directs the Secretary of the Coast Guard to cooperate with the Secretaries of Commerce, State, Defense, and Treasury, and with the Attorney General in conducting a study of methods of enforcing fishery management jurisdiction in U.S. waters, including the possible extension of U.S. jurisdiction. The methods to be studied include, but are not limited to, the use of satellites, remote sensing, vessels, aircraft, radar, and devices implanted on the seafloor.

International Development Association (P.L. 93-373, approved August 14, 1974)—An expenditure of $1.5 billion over a four year period was approved by Congress as the United States' fourth contribution to the International Development Association. The agency is a branch of the World Bank that makes long-term loans with little or no interest to the poorest developing nations for programs in transportation, education, agriculture, and industrial areas. In a formula worked out in 1973, the United States contribution was reduced from 40 percent to 33 1/3 percent of the entire fund. In addition to the general authorization, the legislation instructs the U.S. Governor to the Association to vote against loans to countries developing nuclear devices unless they are parties to the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons Treaty. This provision was included as a response to a nuclear explosion by India in June, 1974.

Asian Development Bank Authorizations (P.L. 93-537, approved December 22, 1974)—Congress passed legislation authorizing $362 million over a three year period for the capital replenishment of the Asian Development Bank. The purpose of the Bank is to invest funds contributed by wealthy nations in Asia and the West in the economic development of the poorer nations of Asia. Forty-one nations are official members of the Bank, 17 of which are donors to the capital pool—now totaling $2.8 billion. The funds authorized by the House are part of the replenishment effort underway by donor nations since 1972. Unlike the practice in other lending institutions, the United States is not the principal contributor. To date, the most money has been contributed by Japan, followed by India and Australia, and then the U.S. The largest recipient nations have been, in order, South Korea, Philippines, Pakistan, Malaysia, and Thailand. The types of projects in which funds have been invested include electric power, industry, transportation and communications, and agriculture. This legislation restores the U.S. voting power to seventeen percent, the same as Japan's, and represents the first U.S. contribution since the Bank was founded in 1966.

United Nations Peacekeeping Forces (H.R. 16982 passed the House November 18, 1974)—The House passed and sent to the Senate legislation authorizing funds for the United Nations peacekeeping forces in the Middle East and Cyprus for fiscal 1975. A total of $4.8 million was allocated for the United Nations Force in Cyprus, and a total of not more than 28.89 percent of the cost of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force and the Emergency Force in the Middle East was authorized for the operations in that area. This represents the same percentage the United States paid during the past year. The total was expected to reach about $24 million for the current fiscal year. The Middle Eastern forces include 5,527 troops along the Israeli-Egyptian border and 1,191 troops separating the Syrians from the Israelis. They are authorized by the U.N. General Assembly to serve as a buffer between the Middle Eastern adversaries, while the process of disengagement of opposing forces and the search for a permanent settlement are pursued. The United States contribution to the forces, the highest of any U.N. member nation, was seen as an integral part of the U.S. efforts to bring about peace in that region.

Foreign Disaster Assistance (P.L. 93-333, approved July 8, 1974)—In order to assist in foreign disaster relief Congress authorized an expenditure of $150 million for disaster relief programs in Pakistan, Nicaragua, Ethiopia, and the Sahelian nations of Africa. Of the total amount, $65 million is for rehabilitation and reconstruction activities in Nicaragua, in response to the 1972 earthquake, and in Pakistan, following the floods of 1973. The remainder, $85 million, is to be allocated to the drought- and famine-stricken nations of Sahelian Africa (encompassing Mauritania, Senegal, Mali, Niger, Chad, and Upper Volta) and to Ethiopia, which is limited to not more than $10 million of the total authorization. The $85 million for Africa could be expended notwithstanding any prohibitions or restrictions contained in the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961. This legislation also incorporates a provision directing the Secretary of State to keep appropriate committees of Congress informed of any negotiations with foreign powers on the cancellation, renegotiation, rescheduling, or settlement of any debt owed to the United States. Furthermore, the text of any such agreement must be submitted to the Speaker of the House and to the appropriate Senate committee within thirty days before it is to take effect.

Intervention on the High Seas Act (P.L. 93-248, approved February 5, 1974)—The purpose of the Act is to implement the International Convention Relating to Intervention on the High Seas in Cases of Oil Pollution Casualties, 1969. The Convention was signed on November 29, 1969, at Brussels by the representatives of the United States Government. On September 20, 1971 the Senate gave its advice and consent to ratification of the Convention. The Convention will come into force following the date on which the Governments of fifteen States have either signed it without reservation or have deposited instruments of ratification, acceptance, approval, or accession. As of January 1974 eleven countries had either signed without reservation, ratified, or acceded to the Convention. The purpose of P.L. 93-248 is to enforce the provisions of the Convention.

The Act authorizes the necessary measures on the high seas to prevent, mitigate or eliminate grave and imminent danger to the coastline or related interests of the United States from pollution or threat of pollution of the sea by oil which may reasonably be expected to result in major harmful consequences. The interests protected include fish, shellfish and other living marine resources, wildlife, coastal zone and estuarine activities, and public and private shorelines and beaches.

When the Secretary (of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating) determines that a grave and imminent danger exists, he may coordinate and direct efforts to remove or eliminate the threatened pollution damage; he may undertake salvage or other action to remove or eliminate the threatened pollution; and he may remove and, if necessary, destroy the ship and cargo which is the source of the danger. The Secretary must review, through extensive consultation, what would likely happen if the measures were not taken and what good and what harm could result from the proposed measures.

The United States is financially liable for damages in the event intervention action is excessive. In that event, actions are authorized against the United States in Federal court.

United Nations Environment Programs (P.L. 93-188, approved December 15, 1973)—Congress provided authorization for participation by the United States in the United Nations environment program, including authorization to contribute funds to the U.N. Environment Fund which was created largely as a result of U.S. efforts. The purpose of the Fund is to coordinate and support international environment activities under the United Nations Environment Programs, and provide assistance to programs in the fields of identification and control of pollutants, monitoring, conservation, human settlements, information exchange, education, training and research. The total amount authorized to be appropriated under the Act is $40 million, out of a total of $100 million for the entire United Nations Environment Fund, including contributions of other Nations. Not more than $10 million is authorized to be appropriated during fiscal year 1974.

Urging U.S. Ratification of Geneva Protocol of 1925 (H. Res. 1258 passed the House August 5, 1974)—The resolution expressed the sense of the House that the Geneva Protocol of 1925, banning the use of gas and bacteriological warfare, be ratified by the Senate. Ratification has been delayed since 1970 by a controversy as to whether tear gas and herbicides were included in the ban. The resolution urged the President and the Congress to reach agreement on the future use of these substances so that ratification could proceed. The House expressed its view that prompt ratification would give force to President Nixon's stated policy of November 25, 1969 that the United States would never be the first nation to use deadly chemical or biological weapons during wartime. Furthermore, it is hoped that a comprehensive review of U.S. policies on chemical warfare will be prompted by renewed consideration of the Geneva Protocol.

Turkish Opium Ban Negotiation (H. Con. Res. 507 passed the House August 5, 1974)—Acting in response to the Turkish Government's declaration of July 1 that it was lifting a ban on poppy cultivation, the House passed and sent to the Senate a resolution urging the President to conduct negotiations with Turkey to prevent the renewed production of opium. Should such negotiations fail, the resolution urged the President to suspend all foreign assistance to Turkey, as provided in the Foreign Assistance Act Amendments of 1971 (P.L. 92-266) which directs an aid cutoff to any nation not taking adequate measures to prevent the flow of illegal drugs to the U.S. In 1972 the Turkish Government had agreed to ban the growing of the poppy in exchange for $35,700,000 as restitution to farmers for losses suffered and for developing alternative crops. Until then, it was estimated that as much as 80 percent of illicit heroin entering the United States had been produced from a Turkish opium base. The 1973 ban was credited with a sharp decline in the availability of heroin in this country.

GENERAL GOVERNMENT

Campaign Financing Amendments (P.L. 93-443, approved October 15, 1974)—This session both Houses approved a comprehensive campaign reform bill (S. 3044) amending the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, which provides for public financing in presidential primary and general elections, contribution and expenditure limitations in all Federal elections, and establishes an independent Federal Elections Commission.

The bill, as reported by the conference committee, is closer to the House-passed measure than the Senate version. It does not include public financing for congressional campaigns as had been contained in the Senate-passed measure. Included in the measure is full, optional public financing for presidential general elections, financed through funds accumulated by the tax "check-off" (Revenue Act of 1971), providing each major party candidate with $20 million apiece. Minor party presidential candidates will receive proportional funding.

Provision is also made for public financing of presidential primary elections. Under the Act's provisions, candidates must demonstrate widespread support by raising $100,000 as a "threshold" figure, with only the first $250 of any contribution counting toward that goal. The money must be raised in amounts of at least $5,000 in 20 states or more. Upon meeting these requirements, candidates are eligible for matching funds on a one-to-one basis for this $100,000 and for every additional dollar raised, but again, only the first $250 of any contribution in excess of $250 is eligible to be matched.

In addition to public financing, the Act imposes strict spending limits on all candidates in Federal elections. These are as follows: presidential primaries—$10 million per candidate for all primaries; presidential general—$20 million per candidate which can be financed totally with public funds; Senate primary—$100,000 or 8 cents per eligible voter, whichever is greater; Senate general—$150,000 or 12 cents per eligible voter, whichever is greater; House primary and general—$70,000 per candidate per election.

Contributions are also limited. An individual will be allowed to contribute up to $1,000 per candidate per election, and up to an aggregate of $25,000 for all candidates for Federal election per year. Organizations are limited to $5,000 per candidate per election, and cash contributions of over $100 are barred.

Family contributions are limited to $25,000, $35,000 and $50,000 for House, Senate, and presidential candidates respectively. Exempted from expenditure limits are amounts, up to 20 percent of the spending limit, for fundraising costs. Also exempted from contribution and expenditure limitations are various independent expenditures made by individuals for food and beverage, invitations, and use of personal property (up to $500 per person per election); various expenditures made by state or local party committees for "state cards," sample ballots and other similarly printed listings are also exempted.

A bi-partisan eight member, fulltime enforcement board is established, with two public members appointed by the Speaker of the House, two by the President pro tempore of the Senate, and two by the President; the Clerk of the House and Secretary of the Senate will sit as non-voting members. The board possesses civil enforcement powers and is authorized to seek court injunctions.

Candidates for Federal election will be required to establish a central campaign committee. Filing dates for disclosure reports are quarterly, 10 days before an election, and 30 days after an election.

In addition, political parties are limited to spending no more than $2 million for their presidential nominating convention. A major party may receive the total sum in public money, or it may choose to fund its convention privately. Parties are also limited to spending $10,000 per candidate in House elections, $20,000 or two cents per eligible voter (the greater) in Senate elections, and two cents per eligible voter in presidential general elections. These expenditures are not included in a candidate's individual spending limit.

All public financing moneys will come from the dollar "check-off" fund and will be subject to congressional appropriation.

Freedom of Information Act Amendments—(Public Law 93-502, approved November 21, 1974)—The Senate joined the House in overriding the President's veto of October 17, 1974 of H.R. 12471, the Freedom of Information Act Amendments. Congressional action on this legislation represents the first amendments to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) since its original enactment in 1966. That milestone law guarantees the right of persons to know about the business of their government, subject to nine categories of exemptions whose invocation is, in most cases, optional.

Public Law 93-502 is the result of over two years of investigative and legislative hearings by the Foreign Operations and Government Information Subcommittee. At the time the original Freedom of Information Act was passed by the Congress, it was recognized that continual oversight by the Committee on Government Operations would result in eventual amendments to the Act.

The FOIA amendments require Federal agencies to adhere to improved administrative procedures designed to enhance responsiveness to FOIA requests. P.L. 93-502 requires agencies to publish and distribute indexes identifying information for the public concerning any agency matter issued or adopted after July 4, 1967. Agencies will also have to furnish their records to any person who reasonably describes and requests such records. Technicalities pertaining to the costs of recovery and duplicating of agency records are also dealt with.

Under the provisions of this legislation, the burden of proof will be on the Government in judicial review to show why requested records should be exempt from mandatory disclosure. Prompt agency response to FOIA suits are mandatory as well as the awarding of attorney fees to plaintiffs who prevail in freedom of information litigation. Federal government agencies must adhere to rigid time limits for responding to information requests and each agency will submit to Congress an annual report evaluating its own performance in administering the Act. The Executive Office of the President is included in the definition of "agency." Exempted from these amendments is information authorized by Executive order to be kept secret in the interest of the national defense or foreign policy.

Franking Privilege (P.L. 93-191, approved December 18, 1973)—Congress passed legislation to clarify the proper use of the franking privilege by Members of Congress. The Act provides that mass mailings (defined as newsletters and similar mailings of more than 500 substantially identical pieces) may not be mailed less than 28 days before any election in which a Member is a candidate for public office, except for mailings—(1) in direct response to inquiries of requests; (2) to colleagues in Congress or to Federal, State, or local officials; and (3) of news releases to the communications media. The Act also allows postal patron mailings by Members of the House in the same manner as is presently utilized today, and prohibits consideration of the cost for franked mail, notwithstanding any Federal, State or local law to the contrary, as a contribution to or expenditure with respect to any limitation on campaign expenditures. In addition, a provision allows costs due to the Postal Service for the sending of Mailgrams to be paid for under the frank.

Political Contributions (P.L. 93-625, approved January 3, 1975)—In passing legislation providing for the duty free importation of various upholstery items, Congress approved amendments to H.R. 421 providing for new tax regulations for political contributions. Under the provisions, newsletter committees of Members of Congress are to be treated for tax purposes as political committees. Funds received for newsletter purposes and so used are not taxable. However, investment income—from newsletter committees and other political committees—is taxable. Funds withdrawn from a newsletter committee for personal use also are taxable.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Furthermore, the maximum allowable Federal income tax credits and deductions are increased from a credit of $12.50 to $25 ($25 to $50 for a joint return) and a deduction of $50 to $100 ($100 to $200 for a joint return). In addition, credits and deductions claimed for contributions made to candidates the year before candidacy is officially announced are also allowable. The Act also provides that: (1) property transferred by a taxpayer to a political committee is now taxable at the time of transfer and (2) gift taxes are not applicable to contributions made to political parties or committees.

Preservation of Presidential Recordings and Materials (P.L. 93-526 approved December 19, 1974)—Congress moved decisively to assert authority over the tapes and documents produced by the Nixon administration in 1974, negating an agreement which would have allowed former President Richard Nixon to control and destroy material produced in his Administration. The provisions of the Presidential Recordings and Materials Preservation Act were framed in response to the post-resignation agreement between President Ford and Richard Nixon, against the backdrop of the entire Watergate affair.

The Act represents a fundamental reevaluation by Congress of the theory of ownership of material produced for public officials. With respect to the Nixon material, the General Services Administration would retain custody of the tapes and documents, and its Administrator would be responsible for promulgating regulations which would allow public access to the material (after providing safeguards for individual legal, and national security interests). Regulations issued under the law would be subject to approval of both Houses of Congress. Richard Nixon would retain the right of unlimited access to the papers, and would be allowed to litigate the matter of ownership of the material. If the courts were to determine that Richard Nixon owned the material, just compensation would be paid, and the government would retain ownership and control.

In addition to the Nixon matter, Congress authorized the establishment of a seventeen member National Study Commission on Records and Documents of Federal Officials to study the problems of control, disposition and preservation of records produced on behalf of Federal officials. In addition to examining the question of ownership of Presidential papers and documents, the Commission is charged with reviewing White House record keeping procedures, rules for the disposition of material of presidential commission, task forces, and boards, and ownership of records of Members of Congress—always keeping in mind the privacy interests of individuals in their deliberations.

Authority for Employment of White House Office and Executive Residence Personnel (H.R. 14715 passed the House June 25, 1974)—Congressional action was taken for the first time to authorize and limit staff support and administrative expenses for operation of the White House Office and Executive Residence and for implementation of the executive duties and responsibilities of the Vice President. The House-passed bill limits the number of upper level positions created by the President in the White House Office by specifying the number of employees that could be placed in Executive Levels II through V. Limitations, too, are placed on the number of employees at each executive level employed by the Vice President in the discharge of executive duties and responsibilities.

Under the provisions of this legislation, experts and consultants engaged by the President could not receive more than the daily equivalent of the rate of pay for Executive Level II, and not more than the daily rate of GS-18, if employed in the services of the Vice President. The President is also authorized to detail employees from other agencies to the White House for a period not to exceed one year.

To increase accountability of a Presidential staff, provisions of the House bill require a presidential report to Congress including the names and job descriptions of every White House employee and the amounts of appropriated funds paid for salaries. Any reimbursements made by the White House Office for detailees from other executive departments and agencies must also be noted. The President is authorized to procure goods and services which he deems necessary for the maintenance and preservation of the Executive Residence.

Appropriations are authorized for official reception and representation expenses within the Executive Office of the President and $100,000 per annum is allowed for traveling expenses of the President. Access to records pertaining to executive entertainment, reception and travel expenditures are granted to the Comptroller General of the General Accounting Office.

Office of Federal Procurement Policy (P.L. 93-400, approved August 30, 1974)—As passed by Congress this legislation establishes an Office of Federal Procurement (OFFP), within the Office of Management and Budget, to function as a central procurement policy unit addressing itself to Federal procurement policies and problems on a Government-wide basis. Under the measure's provisions a system of coordinated procurement regulations is established for the executive agencies, as will a system to monitor business interactions between the Government and private industry. The measure also provides for an Associate Director for Federal Procurement Policy appointed by the President and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

General Accounting Office Act (P.L. 93-604, approved January 2, 1975)—Acting in response to a request of the Comptroller General, Congress moved to revise certain audit functions of the Government Accounting Office and make other administrative changes in order to update the authority of the Comptroller General. Included among the changes authorized under H.R. 12113, is the transfer of the initial travel audit function from GAO to the General Services Administration (involving some 400 GAO employees); authorization to the Comptroller General to audit non-appropriated funds such as military post exchanges and commissaries; and the transfer of control of the GAO building from GSA to the GAO.

Other provisions of the Act shorten from ten to six years the length of time from accrual, during which any claim may be made against the United States; provided that Government Corporations be audited by GAO once every three years rather than annually; and require the Comptroller General to make audits of the General Supply Fund.

Federal Reserve Board Audits by GAO (H.R. 10265 passed the House May 30, 1974)—In an attempt to further the principle of public oversight of governmental operations, the House passed legislation to permit an audit of the Federal Reserve Board by the General Accounting Office. The audit would ensure that administrative funds would be accounted for as well as encourage efficiency and economy within the Federal Reserve System. A total of $80 million is authorized for the construction of Federal Reserve Bank branch buildings.

Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1973 Amended (P.L. 93-253, approved March 16, 1974)—Congress gave final approval to legislation repealing section 2 of Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1973. Reorganization Plan No. 2 was proposed to improve the Federal Government's drug enforcement effort by consolidating drug investigative and intelligence efforts within a new agency at the Department of Justice. The legislation repeals the provisions under which inspection functions at ports of entry of persons and documents leaving the United States would be transferred to the Bureau of Customs.

Simplified Purchase Procedures (P.L. 93-356, approved July 25, 1974)—In order to achieve more economy and efficiency in the Federal procurement of goods and services, Congress passed legislation to raise to $10,000 the statutory ceiling for the use of simplified purchase procedures. Prior to this legislation, the limitation on the use of such procedures was $2500 for agencies and $500 for the Tennessee Valley Authority.

The Act was strongly endorsed by the departments and agencies which have procurement responsibilities and carries out a recommendation in the Report of the Commission on Government Procurement that the $10,000 ceiling would result in annual savings of up to $100 million in the Department of Defense alone. The benefits of simplified procedures for small purchases take the form of savings in administrative costs through reduction in paperwork, personnel, procurement leadtime and inventories.

Commission on Federal Paperwork (P.L. 93-556, approved December 27, 1974)—It is estimated that more than $8 billion each year is spent on the management of Federal paperwork totaling 2 billion pieces of paper. Congress passed legislation creating a temporary Commission on Federal Paperwork to conduct a study of the Federal paperwork burden and make recommendations that would hopefully ameliorate the situation.

Under the provision of H.R. 16424, the 14-member, bipartisan Commission is given a broad mandate to look into all aspects of Federal information activities and all issues which impact upon Federal information activities. The Commission is authorized to make a final report to the Congress and the President within 2 years after the initial Commission meeting. The final report is to include a review of the Commission's findings and its recommendations for change. One hundred and twenty days after submission of the report, the Commission on Federal Paperwork will be terminated. Upon submission of the Commission's final report, the Office of Management and Budget is required to regularly report to the Congress on the implementation of administrative changes recommended by the Commission as well as suggesting needed legislation to enact statutory changes.

Committee Reform Amendments of 1974 (H. Res. 988 agreed to October 8, 1974)—The committee reform measure is designed to increase the efficiency of the legislative process in the House of Representatives. The resolution provided for the establishment of a Select Committee on Aging and for the upgrading of the Permanent Select Committee on Small Business to standing committee status with authority to report legislation as well as investigate the problems of the small business community.

In the area of committee jurisdiction, several changes were accomplished. The Committee on Banking and Currency, to be renamed Banking, Currency and Housing, gains jurisdiction over renegotiation and international monetary financial organizations. Jurisdiction over urban mass transit, export controls, the Commodity Credit Corporation, international trade, and nursing home construction is transferred from Banking and Currency to other House committees.

The Committee on Commerce and Health, formerly the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, gains jurisdiction over biomedical research, nursing construction, and health care programs except those financed through payroll taxes. It lost jurisdiction over aviation, weather, and trading with the enemy.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs gained authority over some international trade matters, the Food for Peace Program (P.L. 480) except domestic production, international commodity agreements, and export controls. The Committee also received special oversight responsibility for international financial and monetary institutions, customs administration, and intelligence activities relating to foreign policy. Jurisdiction for international fishing agreements and international financial monetary organizations was shifted to other committees.

The Committee on Government Operations gained jurisdiction over the National Archives and general revenue sharing. The Committee on Public Works; renamed Public Works and Transportation, gained most jurisdiction over transportation. In addition to its jurisdiction over highways, the Committee gained urban mass transit, civil aviation, and surface transit except railroads. The Committee lost jurisdiction over parks in the District of Columbia.

The Committee on Science and Astronautics, renamed Science and Technology, gained jurisdiction over civil aviation research and development, environmental R&D, and all energy R&D except for nuclear energy R&D.

The most extensive changes produced by the committee reform package were in the procedural area. The Speaker is granted latitude in referring legislation to committees. Referral can be made by him to more than one committee for concurrent or sequential consideration, matters could be divided for consideration, or referral could be made to a special ad hoc committee appointed by the Speaker with the approval of the House. Organization of the House is permitted prior to the start of each new Congress with the House to meet in election years between December 1 and 20 for this purpose. A 100-word description of each bill introduced must be prepared for publication in the Congressional Record and the Digest of Public Bills as soon after introduction as possible.

Several provisions were made to assist the House in improving its operations. A House Commission on Information and Facilities is established to carry out studies of House needs for information and for administrative services and facilities. A Legislative Classification Office is created to develop a cross-reference system linking authorizations, appropriations, committee jurisdiction, and agency programs to basic statutes. An Office of Law Revision Counsel is established to codify the laws of the United States.

The House Members of the Joint Committee on Congressional Operations are required to make continuing studies of committee jurisdictions and workloads and to submit periodic reports to the Rules Committee, including recommendations for needed changes. In addition, House Members of the Joint Committee are asked to work with their Senate counterparts to rationalize the legislative jurisdictions of House and Senate Committees.

In reference to committee organization and operations, the resolution makes several changes. All standing committees with more than 15 Members are required to establish 4 subcommittees. Proxy voting in committees is prohibited. All standing committees are granted standing power to issue subpoenas by majority vote of the Committee. In appointing Members to conference committees, the Speaker is required to appoint a majority of Members who supported the House position generally, as determined by the Speaker. Resident Commissioners and Delegates also may be appointed as conferees. Staff size of standing committees is increased from 12 (6 professional and 6 clericals) to a total of 30 (18 professional and 12 clericals) with the minority allowed to appoint 10 of these staffers. In addition, the minority also gains control of one-third of the investigative funds committees use to supplement their staffs. The ranking minority Member of each subcommittee (up to 6) is permitted to appoint one professional using such funds.

To fulfill its oversight function committees may establish a separate subcommittee on oversight or require each subcommittee to perform this function in its area of jurisdiction. Committees may include summaries of findings of oversight subcommittees or the Committee on Government Operations in reports on legislation.

Other provisions require all committees to include a statement of the bill's impact on inflation in all reports on legislation. All reports on appropriations bills must include a concise statement of the effects of any provisions that would change existing law.

Attorney General's Pay (P.L. 93-178, approved December 10, 1973)—Congress took action to lower the salary of the Attorney General to pre-1969 levels to eliminate the constitutional ineligibility of the nominee by the President for that office, Senator William Saxbe. The Constitution states that "No Senator or Representative shall, during the Term for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the Authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the Emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during such time." Since Congress had voted to increase the salary of the Attorney General during the tenure of Mr. Saxbe as Senator, Congress cleared the way for eligibility of the President's nominee by reducing the salary from its present level of $60,000 to the pre-1969 level of $35,000.

Modification of Certain Reports to Congress (P.L. 93-608, approved January 2, 1975)—In the second session of the 93d Congress the House passed legislation designed to reduce the volume of reporting on the part of Federal departments and agencies to committees of Congress.

In 1972 the House Committee on Government Operations asked the General Accounting Office to make a study of the laws which require such reports. GAO compiled a list of 747 reports which Federal departments, agencies, councils and commissions submit to Congress. Of these, 544 reports are requested by law and 203 are prepared either by request of Congressional committees or voluntarily. Out of this list of reports GAO selected a number which could possibly be eliminated or modified in some way. GAO next checked with the congressional committees which receive the reports which might be eliminated or modified, and came up with a list of 79 such reports. With the agreement of the recipient committees, GAO suggested that 54 of these reports be eliminated and 25 be modified. Of the 79 reports, 51 are required by statute and 28 are not. H.R. 14718 deals with 39 of the 51 reports that are required by statute.

H.R. 14718 provides for elimination of 26 of the 39 reports, for reduction in the frequency with which six others are submitted, and for elimination of parts of seven other reports that are of little or no use. It is estimated that the saving to the Government of reducing the volume of reporting to Congress is approximately $173,000 per annum.

Joint Funding Simplification Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-510, approved December 5, 1974)—The Congress approved legislation in the Second Session designed to improve the operation of grants-in-aid to States and localities by simplifying procedures for the approval and operation of projects drawing upon more than one Federal assistance program. The Joint Funding Simplification Act of 1974 provides a basis for: meeting inter-related needs with one comprehensive plan for receiving grants from several Federal agencies through one Federal funding source; establishing work plans and priorities geared to the needs of the grantees, rather than conforming to Washington-imposed plans; receiving Federal funds in synchronization with the grantee's own planning and funding cycles; simplifying and standardizing administrative requirements; simplifying paperwork and recordkeeping; reporting progress to one Federal center rather than several; and replacing separate Federal agency audits with a single audit by only one agency.

The law does not affect the substantive provisions of existing grant programs, and the identity, purpose, and criteria for eligibility of each program will remain untouched.

Procedures for Certain Protective Services Provided by the U.S. Secret Service (H.R. 17311 passed the House December 16, 1974).—During hearings held in 1973 before the House Government Activities Subcommittee, there was demonstrated a need for some sort of statutory definition concerning the expenditure of Federal funds in support of Presidential properties. As passed by the House, H.R. 17311 provides for the specific statutory basis and definition of the circumstances under which protection may be furnished to the President and other persons entitled to protection under title 18, U.S. Code and Public Law 90-331. The bill provides specific limitations with respect to security expenditures on property which is not owned by the Government. Permanent security for each person entitled to protection would be limited to one non-Government property. This legislation establishes a system by which the Secret Service would be required to reimburse other Federal agencies for any protective assistance they provide. As a result, Secret Service budgets would reflect the actual cost of protecting the President and his family, the Vice President, former Presidents, and others entitled to protection.

Transmittal to States of Certain Census Tabulations (H.R. 13340 passed the House November 18, 1974).—This measure is designed to improve Census Bureau support of future State legislative districting. It authorizes State authorities to submit, not later than two years prior to the Decennial Census date, a plan identifying those geographic areas for which population tabulations are desired for State legislative redistricting purposes. The Secretary of Commerce is required to produce population counts for the areas identified in the approved State plans within one year following the census date. The bill would save the State taxpayers millions of dollars, while at the same time giving the States and local governments considerable help, probably at very little, if any, costs to the Federal Government.

HEALTH AND MEDICAL CARE

Health Maintenance Organizations (P.L. 93-222, approved December 29, 1973).—Faced with increasing problems in the delivery of health care in this Nation and the spiraling expenses of adequate health care, Congress passed one of the most significant, innovative health bills in recent years by approving development on an experimental basis of health maintenance organizations with Federal assistance. Health maintenance organizations are to deliver medical care to enrollees who, for a prepaid amount, have a right to contract for care by the health organizations. Health maintenance organizations differ from insurance companies in that for a prepaid premium they deliver actual health care services to the enrollee rather than pay for health care delivered by others. Congress recognized the obvious advantages which health maintenance organizations offer. An HMO can take advantage of efficient management and more productive use of health manpower. Since an HMO may be responsible for an individual over a period of time, it can provide more preventive medicine, and thus correct some problems before they require expensive hospitalization. HMO's can also provide physicians' pay which is competitive with what physicians make in fee-for-service practice. In addition, a physician can plan his working hours while being assured other physicians will cover for himself while he is off duty. Most of the Health Maintenance Organizations have been financed without Federal assistance.

Federal aid, however, is essential in many cases to groups serving inner-city or rural or other now under-served areas, or groups, started by doctors lacking working capital. Although the system has operated for some years now, with services to some estimated seven million people, Congress has passed this legislation to assure that adequate financial assistance will be provided to the existing organizations and to new organizations so that any person will have the option of such an organization from among health benefit plans. The Act will provide funds for feasibility studies, planning, development and initial operating expenses of the Health Organizations.

Health Revenue Sharing and Health Services Act (H.R. 14214 pocket vetoed by the President December 23, 1974).—Both Houses agreed to provisions of H.R. 14214 which authorize $1,858.5 billion for 2-year extensions on five health service delivery programs which expired on June 30, 1974. The programs funded are health revenue sharing, family planning, community mental health centers, migrant health, and community health centers. A total amount of $320 million is authorized for comprehensive public health services, $472.5 million for family planning, $303 million for community mental health centers, $155 million for migrant health, and $540 million for community health centers. In addition, health programs are authorized for specific disease control and community health problems.

The Act authorizes $20 million for an Office of Rape Prevention and Control, within the Department of Health, Education, Welfare, $18 million for a two-year extension for hemophilia control and prevention, a two-year extension for the study and prevention of hypertension, a one-year study of Epilepsy and Huntington's Disease, $15 million for a one-year demonstration project to provide home health services, and $15 million for rat-control projects to prevent diseases borne by rodents. The Act also directs the Secretary of HEW to appoint a commission to report on the mental health problems of the elderly within one year.

The basic thrust of the Act is to insure the continuation and improvement of health-service and disease-control programs that affect the health and welfare of literally millions of Americans, many of whom are either acutely deprived individuals, or who live in areas of the United States which have historically been lacking in medical facilities and accessibility to adequate health care protection. The revenue sharing provisions of this legislation insure that this community-based Federal-State private partnership for delivering health care will continue, and will in fact be a preface to a national health insurance program.

Perhaps the most promising aspect of the Act is the flexibility it affords the States in using the monies authorized. Under the terms of the bill, the States and localities will now have an opportunity to initiate new and different methods of providing health service where innovation is needed, particularly where existing State or local funds are inadequate to support new health services.

Emergency Medical Services (P.L. 93-154, approved November 16, 1973).—Although initially vetoed by President Nixon, legislation was approved by Congress that provides Federal aid to area-wide systems of emergency medical care. In this second version of the emergency services bill Congress dropped provisions to block Administration efforts to end inpatient services at seven of eight Public Health Service hospitals. Congress authorized $185 million for fiscal years 1974, 1975, and 1976 for grants and contracts to plan, establish, initially operate and expand area emergency care systems, to train personnel and to conduct research in emergency medicine. It is estimated conservatively that 175,000 people die needlessly each year.

Experts estimate that each year 15 to 20 percent of all highway victims could be saved if prompt and effective emergency care were available, with approximately 8,000 to 11,000 highway deaths prevented each year. In addition, ten percent of the 275,000 heart attack fatalities, they say, could be saved by proper emergency care. In just these two areas alone, auto accidents and heart attacks, each year as many as 35,000 Americans could be saved from tragic, unnecessary deaths. Hearings uncovered that each year more than 20,000 Americans are permanently injured or disabled by untrained ambulance attendants.

Although Congress finally voted to drop the provision prohibiting the hospital closings, Congress attached the prohibition to the defense procurement bill, cleared November 5. P.L. 93-154 increases grants to rural areas to 20 percent from 15 percent. The maximum Federal share of the cost of expanding and improving emergency care systems in areas of exceptional need will be increased from 50 percent to 75 percent. Substantial emphasis has been placed on the development of emergency medical services to rural areas.

Vocational Rehabilitation (P.L. 93-112, approved September 26, 1973).—The training of handicapped Americans for productive jobs has also been a top priority of this Congress. This Act authorizes $1.65 billion in fiscal years 1974 and 1975, an amount substantially lower than those authorized in the vetoed bills—$3.5 billion and $2.6 billion respectively. The 1973 Act requires State rehabilitation agencies to serve the most severely handicapped first, with each State to receive a basic allotment of at least $2 million or one quarter of one percent of funds appropriated the basic program, whichever was greater.

Congress also required that personal guidance services be established, that an Architectural and Transportation Barriers Compliance Board be created to enforce existing requirements that public buildings and transportation be accessible to the handicapped, and that Federal mortgage insurance be available for construction of rehabilitation facilities. The Secretary of HEW may authorize research and training grants and contracts for work in the rehabilitation field. Congress authorized such sums as necessary for construction of rehabilitation facilities and for grants to provide vocational training services for the handicapped.

Rehabilitation Act Amendments (P.L. 93-516, approved December 7, 1974).—Congress extended all programs authorized by the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 for one year, through fiscal 1976. Under this Act, in fiscal 1973, State vocational rehabilitation agencies served almost 1.2 million handicapped individuals and successfully rehabilitated over 360,000 of them for employment. The Act also makes available funds for research on handicapping conditions, training of personnel to work with the handicapped, and the planning, staffing, and construction of rehabilitation facilities.

The amendments authorize a total of $851.5 million for fiscal 1976, of which $720 million is allotted to the basic State grant program. Two million dollars has been authorized for a national White House Conference on the Handicapped to be held within three years, and an additional $10,000-$25,000 per State for State conferences on the handicapped.

The Act provides for the transfer of the Rehabilitation Services Administration from the Social and Rehabilitation Service (SRS) to the Department of Health, Administration, and Welfare. This transfer to the Office of the Secretary of HEW should give rehabilitation service programs greater visibility and emphasize their importance to millions of American citizens. Also included in the Act are amendments to the Randolph-Sheppard Act of 1936 which strengthen the blind vendors program by giving priority to blind persons in establishing and operating vending stands on Federal property, and by stipulating that, where feasible, new and renovated Federal buildings are to make provision for blind vending stands. In addition, a formula has been established for distributing income to blind vendors from competing vending machines on Federal property.

Health Services Research, Health Statistics, and Medical Libraries Act (P.L. 93-353, approved July 23, 1974).—Congress amended the Public Health Service Act to revise the programs of health services research, and to extend the program of assistance for medical libraries. To meet the expenses for these programs the Act provides authorizations as follows: for health services research—$65.2 million for fiscal year 1975 and $80 million for fiscal year 1976; for health statistical activities—$30 million each for fiscal years 1975 and 1976; and for the medical libraries program—$17.5 million for fiscal year 1975, $20 million for fiscal year 1976, with provision for an automatic 1-year extension for fiscal 1977 at $20 million.

Both Houses voted to give statutory authority to both the National Center for Health Services Research (NCHSR) and to the National Center for Health Statistics within the Department of HEW, in addition to giving broad legislative authority to NCHSR to design and conduct research. Provisions of the Act require the consolidation and expansion of present authorities for the collection, analysis, and publication of health statistics on a broad range of contemporary health topics.

The Act also requires the establishment and operation of at least six independent health services research centers, one of which is to be designated a Health Care Technology Center to focus on a wide spectrum of technology. This is to include computers, and other electronic devices, and the development of health care delivery systems. A Health Care Management Center is also authorized to focus on the improvement of management in the health field, the training of health administrators, and the development of leaders, planners, and policy analysts in the area of public health.

National Research Act (P.L. 93-348, approved July 12, 1974).—To assure the continued excellence of biomedical and behavioral research and to provide for the protection of human subjects in such research, Congress amended the Public Health Services Act to provide for the establishment of a program of National Research Service Awards. The Act also provides for biomedical and behavioral research at the National Institutes of Health and the Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Administration, and provision is made for grants for similar research at public and nonprofit private institutions.

Individuals receiving awards are required to engage in health research or training, or in the National Health Services Corps, for specified periods of time. Physicians, nurses and other specialists who receive such awards may be authorized to serve in geographical areas requiring their given specialties, or else in health maintenance organizations, or the National Health Service Corps. Individuals who receive awards and who default in required service repayment are required to reimburse the Federal government. A total of $207,947,000 was appropriated for fiscal year 1975 for the National Research Service Awards.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

The Act establishes a National Commission for the Protection of Human Subjects of Biomedical and Behavioral Research, with membership to consist of individuals in medicine, law, ethics, theology, the physical and social sciences, philosophy, the humanities, health administration, government, and public affairs. Members will serve for the life of the Commission and be compensated for their services. The Commission will be responsible for identifying basic ethical principles which should underlie the conduct of such research and to develop guidelines to be followed to insure that such research is conducted in accordance with these principles. The Commission is required to establish set requirements for informed consent to participation by participants—children, prisoners and the institutionalized mentally infirm—in biomedical and behavioral research, and is to determine whether a special mechanism is needed to protect subjects in this type of research.

The Commission is also directed (1) to determine the nature and extent of research involving living fetuses, the purpose for the research, and alternative means of achieving this purpose; (2) to undertake a study to determine the extent of psychosurgery as a medical procedure in the U.S. for a five year period terminating in 1972, evaluate its appropriateness, and make recommendations about its continuance as a procedure; (3) to make recommendations to Congress regarding the functions and authority of the National Advisory Council for the Protection of Subjects of Biomedical and Behavioral Research—to be established under the Public Health Service Act; (4) to undertake a comprehensive study of the ethical, social and legal implications of advances in biomedical and behavioral research and technology.

Health Programs Extension Act (P.L. 93-45, approved June 18, 1973).—Congress early in 1973 voted to continue a group of health programs the Administration sought to terminate, including programs such as aid to schools of public health, comprehensive health services, Hill-Burton hospital construction, migrant health programs, family planning and community health centers. Congress believes these and other programs are absolutely necessary if we are to continue to deliver quality health care to all Americans. With this one-year extension, Congress will have an opportunity for orderly consideration of proposed revision in these health programs. Congress authorized $1.27 billion for one year to extend the twelve existing health authorities under the Public Health Service Act, the Community Mental Health Centers Act, and the Development Disabilities Services and Facilities Construction Act. The legislation denies any court, public official or public authority the right to require individuals or institutions receiving assistance under the above acts to perform abortions or sterilization contrary to any person's religious beliefs or moral convictions.

Lead-Based Paint Poisoning Prevention (P.L. 93-151, approved November 9, 1973).—In an effort to hasten Federal efforts against lead-based paint poisoning, Congress approved legislation amending and extending the Lead-Based Paint Poisoning Act of 1970. Congress authorized $63 million in each of fiscal years 1974 and 1975 to detect and treat the disease, to eliminate lead-based paint hazards in older dwellings and to conduct further research to determine allowable lead content in household paints. To assure that paint manufacturers meet a national uniform standard, local and State laws covering allowable lead content are pre-empted. The maximum Federal share of local government agency treatment and detection programs is increased to 90 percent from 75 percent.

Scholarship and Loan Programs for Health Professions (P.L. 93-385, approved August 23, 1974).—Legislation was approved this session to amend the Public Health Service Act by extending through fiscal year 1975 the scholarship program for the National Health Service Corps, and the loan program for health professions students.

To accomplish this, Congress authorized the following appropriations: $40 million for the Public Health and National Health Service Corps Scholarship Training Program; $60 million for loans to health professional students other than nurses; and $35 million for loans to nursing students.

This emergency one-year extension of the National Health Service Corps Scholarship and Loan Program will provide financial assistance to over half of the 14,500 men and women who will enter medical schools in 1975. It will also assist approximately 20% of the 96,000 nursing students who will enter nursing schools in 1975.

One of the most important features of these loans to needy students is the repayment mechanism. Students receiving such aid must reimburse the government by serving, after graduation, in those sections of the country where a chronic shortage of professional health personnel exist.

Sudden Infant Death Syndrome Act (P.L. 93-270, approved April 22, 1974).—Final action was taken this session on legislation requiring the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to undertake a program of information about sudden infant death syndrome and to disseminate such information to health professionals, public safety officials, and the general public. The Secretary may also make grants and award contracts to public and nonprofit private entities for research and information gathering about the causes of sudden infant death syndrome, and to provide information and counseling to families victimized by this problem. Applications for contracts or grants must be approved by the Secretary and Funds appropriated for these purposes are as follows: $2 million for fiscal year 1975; $3 million for fiscal year 1976; and $4 million for fiscal year 1977.

National Cancer Act (P.L. 93-352, approved July 23, 1974).—During this session, the National Cancer Act of 1971 was extended and funding increased for the research program at $750 million, $830 million, and $885 million for fiscal years 1976, 1976, and 1977 respectively. Requirement was set forth that the national cancer program collect, analyze, and disseminate information useful to cancer patients, with emphasis on nutrition programs for these patients. The Act further requires that cancer programs provide routine tests for the diagnosis of uterine cancer, authorizing $3.5 million for that purpose for each of the three fiscal years. The Director of the National Cancer Institute (NCI) is required to let contracts for information programs which will interpret and disseminate new and existing information regarding the cause, prevention, diagnosis, and treatment of cancer and other related health problems. Scientific peer review is required of the research grants and contracts let by each institute within the National Institutes of Health. The Act requires the establishment of a President's Biomedical Research Panel to review and make recommendations on the organization and operation of biomedical and behavioral research conducted and supported under the programs of the various Institutes of NIH, and to submit a report of its findings to the President and Congress.

Limitation on Federal Funds for Abortions (P.L. 93-355, approved July 25, 1974).—On January 22, 1973, the United States Supreme Court announced a decision in two cases regarding abortion, and removed most legal barriers to abortion during the early months of pregnancy. During the second session of the 93rd Congress, as in the first session, action was taken on several bills to limit the use of federal funds for abortion.

P.L. 93-355, the Legal Services Corporation Act, passed the House of Representatives during the first session but received final approval during the second session of the 93rd Congress. Both the House and Senate versions of the bill included floor amendments to limit the use of funds under the Act for legal services with respect to abortion. The conference version, as enacted, provides in Section 1007(b) (8) that no funds may be used "to provide legal assistance with respect to any proceeding which seeks to procure a nontherapeutic abortion or to compel any individual or institution to perform an abortion, or assist in the performance of an abortion, or provide facilities for the performance of an abortion, contrary to the religious beliefs or moral convictions of such individual or institution."

During the Second Session, the House also passed H.R. 14449, the Community Services Act, on May 29, 1974 to which a floor amendment was added which provides, "No financial assistance shall be extended under this section for medical assistance and supplies in cases of abortion or sterilization."

Drug Abuse Education Act (P.L. 93-422, approved September 21, 1974)—Congress extended the Drug Abuse Education Act of 1970 (P.L. 91-527) for three years, authorizing $90 million for fiscal year 1977 for school-based and community-based programs of drug abuse and alcohol education and training programs. This legislation sets priorities and allots specific amounts for Federal programs, State and local education agencies and community projects. The 1970 Act was designed to train elementary and secondary teachers in drug abuse courses and to meet the lack of scientifically accurate teaching materials on the subjects.

Developmental Disabilities and Facilities Construction Act Amendments (H.R. 14215 passed the House July 11, 1974)—During the Second Session, the House provided for a two-year extension, through fiscal year 1976, of programs for individuals with developmental disabilities, authorizing a total of $192 million for the two years. Grants would be authorized to university-affiliated facilities for the developmentally disabled. Establishment of a new special project authority is authorized, and in place of the existing 10% allocation of state allotments for projects of special national significance, a new 30% allocation for such projects is substituted. States would be required under the legislation to spend certain amounts for de-institutionalization of persons with developmental disabilities, inappropriately placed in institutions. The bill further would eliminate the requirement of Federal approval for individual construction projects funded with State grant funds.

The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare is required to determine the neurological diseases to be considered as developmental disabilities and to determine the adequacy of services for persons with diseases not covered under the Developmental Disabilities Services and Facilities Construction Act. Autism, however, is included as a disease covered by special projects and State allotment programs.

Diabetes Mellitus Research Act (P.L. 93-354, approved July 23, 1974)—Recognizing that diabetes mellitus is a serious health problem in the United States, the Congress passed legislation which establishes a National Commission on Diabetes, and authorizes funding for that purpose and for other measures designed to treat and control this disease. A total of one million dollars has been allocated for long-range planning in connection with diabetes control programs. Intensive biomedical and drug therapy research programs are mandated by the Act and are supported by allocations of $9, $12, and $20 million dollars for Fiscal Years 1975, 1976 and 1977, respectively. One principal focus of this research will be a study of insulin, the principal diabetic control drug, to determine how it is produced and released in the body and how it does its vital work.

The Act also provides for the inclusion of diabetes on the list of diseases covered by the Public Health Services Act, and establishes a Diabetic Coordinating Committee to exercise oversight of research activity at NIH and other Federal agencies with respect to diabetes. In addition, a special new position, Associate Director for Diabetes, is authorized at the National Institute of Arthritis, Metabolism and Digestive Disease, in order to implement diabetes control programs.

The importance of this legislation is best supported by a look at American health statistics. These reveal that diabetes afflicts over 5 million Americans, is the 5th leading cause of death from disease, and attacks 325,000 Americans each year. It is the second leading cause of new blindness, and produces blindness 20 years earlier than the leading cause of blindness.

Diabetes has a devastating effect on life expectancy. During the 1950's the average life expectancy of a teenager who developed the disease was 22 years. Since that time the life expectancy rate for diabetics has increased only five years because of the inability of American medicine to prevent or treat the degenerative physical and biological complications triggered by this disease. Medical science shows that diabetes is linked directly to heart attack, blindness, kidney failure, amputations and obstetrical mishaps, and thus is one of the most insidious diseases to afflict mankind. Measured in economic terms, diabetes costs the American economy at least $2 billion annually in terms of premature deaths, lifetime disability, and sickness absenteeism.

Narcotics Treatment Programs (P.L. 93-281, approved May 14, 1974)—In order to more effectively control the illegal use of methadone and other narcotics used in drug treatment programs, both Houses gave approval to this Act which requires those individuals dispensing such drugs to register with the Attorney General. Those who register are required to comply with Justice Department standards for security of such drugs and regulations of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare governing unsupervised use of narcotics.

Fire Prevention and Control Act (P.L. 93-498, approved October 29, 1974)—In an effort to reduce the Nation's losses caused by fire, and to supplement existing programs of fire-prevention by State and local governments, the Congress approved legislation which establishes a National Fire Prevention and Control Administration and a Fire Research Center within the Department of Commerce, and an intensified program of research relating to burn injuries, smoke injuries, and fire victim rehabilitation within the National Institute of Health. The Act further provides for the establishment of a National Academy for Fire Prevention and Control and a National Fire Data Center, both under the Fire Prevention and Control Administration, in order to train fire service personnel in skills designed to prevent and control fires and to develop professional knowledge and curricula in fire engineering, and fire prevention technology. For these purposes $10 million was appropriated for fiscal year 1975 and $15 million for fiscal year 1976.

Public Law 93-498 is based in large part on findings by the National Commission on Fire Prevention and Control. An exhaustive study undertaken by that organization shows that the U.S. today has the highest per capita rate of death and property loss from fire of all the major industrialized nations in the world. The devastating scope and dimensions of this public health and safety problem is best shown by statistics gathered by the Commission. These reveal that fire kills 12,000 Americans annually, injures 300,000, and that 50,000 of these victims require extended hospitalization. In economic terms, almost $3 billion worth of property is destroyed by fire.

The total economic cost of destructive fire in the U.S. estimated conservatively to be $11 billion per year.

Public Health Services Act Amendment (H.R. 10957 passed the House January 21, 1974)—In order to promote maximum health for each individual as a national goal, the House authorized the creation of advisory councils, or committees to advise the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare on national health and medical care. To do so, the Act authorizes certain functions of the National Advisory Health Council—such as research and training grants—to be transferred to other areas, if the advisory councils and the Secretary concur. Further, the Act (1) requires that the Public Health Service be composed of a Regular and Reserve Corps, both to be administered by the Surgeon General; (2) authorizes the Secretary to accept aid from State and local authorities in the enforcement of warranty regulations; (3) requires the Secretary to determine the necessary quantities of certain drugs which are required for medical and scientific research, but which are subject to this Act and to the Controlled Substances Import and Export Act; (4) directs the Secretary to assist States in drug problems and to advise authorized representatives of the States about the care, treatment and rehabilitation of drug addicts, and (5) authorizes United States participation in international cooperative research in connection with biomedical health and health services.

The general research authority of the Secretary of HEW regarding physical and mental diseases is also set forth, and the confidentiality and privacy of subjects involved in research activities relating to the use and effects of drugs is insured.

Limits are set on the Federal share of financing for Public Health Service facilities for persons with developmental disabilities at 66 2/3%, and provision made for judicial review if the Secretary refuses to approve any such project. Provision too is made for the Federal share of costs in connection with construction of community mental health centers. Grants to medical schools and other health training facilities, however, are prohibited unless they can provide satisfactory assurance of non-discrimination on the basis of sex in their admissions policy.

HOUSING

Housing and Community Development Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-383, approved August 22, 1974)—Congress completed action on what has been called the most significant piece of housing and community development legislation in thirty-five years. The provisions of this legislation are the result of four years of work, study, and debate by the Congress, and they affect virtually every aspect of housing and community development activity. The law provides $11.9 billion in new authorizations for programs designed to create more liveable communities and better housing for all Americans.

The Housing and Community Development Act of 1974 establishes a new system of Federal assistance for community development programs through block grants rather than categorical grants. This legislation terminates the following categorical grant programs: Open space—urban beautification—historic preservation grants; Public facility loans; Water and sewer neighborhood facility grants; Urban renewal and neighborhood development program grants; Model Cities supplement grants; and Rehabilitation loans (programs to be ended one year from enactment). These grants are replaced by a single block grant for community development which may be used for a number of eligible activities similar to those carried on under the more narrow categorical programs. The responsibility for assessing community development needs, allocating community development funds within the community, and developing programs will be placed on locally elected officials rather than on Federal bureaucrats in Washington.

The law authorizes appropriations of $8.4 billion in contract authority for three years, which is to be allocated according to an objective "needs" formula taking into account poverty, population, and housing needs. Eighty percent of the total allocation is to be distributed among the Nation's Standard Metropolitan Statistical Areas, and the remaining twenty percent is reserved for non-metropolitan areas.

In the first three years of the new program, the new formula allocation system will be gradually phased in alongside provisions designed to hold certain communities at the level of assistance they received under the terminated categorical programs. In the second three years, these "hold harmless" provisions will be reduced gradually until all jurisdictions receive Federal community development assistance on the basis of their needs as determined by the formula system. No local matching contributions are required by the Act.

In order to deal with the problem of decent housing for lower-income persons and families, the Act creates a new housing assistance program which authorizes the leasing of new and existing housing accommodations for families with incomes below the median income in the area. In order to induce private owners and developers to participate in this program, the Secretary will set "fair market" rentals in each area for units of various size. Assisted families or individuals will pay from 15 to 25 percent of their income (depending on the size of family, extent of medical and unusual expenses, and other factors), and the Federal government will pay the owner the difference between these amounts and the approved rent for the units.

In addition to creating the Housing Assistance Payments programs, the Act makes a number of changes designed to extend and strengthen existing public housing programs, and provides a system for allocating housing subsidy funds, since there are likely to be far more applications for subsidized housing developments than can be funded in any one year. Funds are to be allocated on the basis of objective criteria (e.g., population, poverty, housing conditions and vacancies). At least 20 but not more than 25 percent of the total funds are to be distributed to nonmetropolitan areas.

A number of revisions are made by the Act in the various mortgage credit assistance programs operated by the Federal Housing Administration which will make it easier for all Americans to achieve the goal of homeownership. The mortgage ceiling for single-family homes, which had been $30,000, was raised to $45,000. This increase was intended to reactivate FHA mortgage lending in many areas in which it is no longer feasible to build under the old limits. For the same reason, overall maximum project mortgage dollar limits previously applicable under FHA multifamily, group practice, hospital, nursing home, and land development programs are removed. The Act also amends Title V of the National Housing Act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sex in the making of Federally-related mortgage loans, insurance guaranty, or related assistance; lenders are required to consider combined incomes of husband and wife in extending mortgage credit.

Several new provisions are designed to encourage construction of housing which utilizes modern energy conservation techniques. The Secretary is required to promote the use of energy saving techniques through minimum property standards established for newly constructed residential housing subject to mortgages insured under the National Housing Act. In addition, property improvement loans will now be available to finance the provision of energy conserving improvements or solar energy systems in existing housing. The Secretary is authorized, after consulting with the National Science Foundation, to undertake a demonstration program to determine the economic and technical feasibility of utilizing solar energy for heating or cooling residential housing (including demonstrations of new housing design or structure that makes use of solar energy).

The Act authorizes $130 million in fiscal 1975 and $150 million in fiscal 1974 for grants to States and communities to use in developing the plans required in this Act, and for other planning purposes. It also authorizes $7 million for training housing and urban specialists.

In order to improve housing conditions in rural areas, authorizations for various existing programs were increased and extended. Rehabilitation loans and grants and farm labor housing programs each were provided increased authorizations of $30 million. Research grants were increased from $250,000 per year to $1 million per year, and the research program will be extended to include small rural towns with a serious lack of mortgage credit. Previously, it had applied only to farm housing. A new program of technical and supervisory assistance for low-income families was added in order to help those families to benefit from Federal, State or local housing programs in rural areas.

The legislation includes a new National Mobile Home Construction and Safety Standards Act designed "to reduce the number of personal injuries and deaths and the amount of insurance costs and property damage resulting from mobile home accidents and to authorize mobile home safety research and development." This new law requires the Secretary, after consultation with the Consumer Product Safety Commission, to issue Federal mobile home construction and safety standards, taking into consideration existing State and local laws. If a mobile home does not conform to a Federal safety standard, the manufacturer will have to repurchase the home or bring it up to standard.

The new law also provides for Federal encouragement of and participation in the "urban homesteading" programs which are underway in a number of communities. The Secretary is authorized to transfer, without payment, certain Secretary-held unoccupied one-to-four family dwellings to State or units of general local government for use in such a program. HUD Regional Offices are required to keep an inventory of property available for urban homesteading purposes. An acceptable urban homesteading will provide for: (1) conditional conveyance of unoccupied residential property to an individual or family without substantial consideration; (2) an equitable procedure for selecting recipients of property; (3) an agreement under which the recipient agrees to occupy the property for a minimum of three years, make necessary repairs, and permit periodic inspections; (4) an agreement of revocation of conveyance upon any material breach of the agreement and full conveyance upon compliance; and (5) a coordinated approach toward neighborhood improvement and upgrading of community facilities.

A new National Institute of Building Sciences is established to develop, promulgate and evaluate criteria for housing and building regulations. The Institute is to function as a source of technical findings and as an advisor to public agencies and private groups in the use of building science and technology.

The Housing and Community Development Act of 1974 includes provisions that will encourage, through the guarantee of obligations, the formation and effective operation of State housing finance agencies and State development agencies. These agencies are to be encouraged to carry out activities designed to (1) provide housing and related facilities for the low and moderate income group, (2) promote sound growth and development through revitalizing poor areas, (3) increase and improve employment opportunities through industrial and commercial development, or (4) implement the development of State land use and preservation policies.

Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-533, approved December 22, 1974)—This legislation is designed to reform the real estate settlement process in order to insure that consumers throughout the Nation are provided with greater and more timely information on the nature and costs of the settlement process and are protected from unnecessarily high settlement charges incurred by certain abusive practices that have developed in some areas of the country. The Act is expected to result in more effective advance disclosure to home buyers and sellers of settlement costs; in the elimination of kickbacks or referral fees that tend to increase unnecessarily the costs of certain settlement services; in a reduction in the amounts home buyers are required to place in escrow accounts established to insure the payments of real estate taxes and insurance; and in significant reform and modernization of local recordkeeping of land title information.

Emergency Home Purchase Assistance Act (P.L. 93-449, approved October 18, 1974)—Both Houses in the Second Session acted on S. 3979 which is designed to help revive the depressed housing industry and put construction workers back on the job. The Act will make available during the coming year $7.75 billion for the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) to buy mortgages financing housing for hard-pressed middle-income families. Of this amount, $3 billion—enough to finance 100,000 homes—will be made available immediately. The bill authorizes HUD to purchase conventional mortgages from building and loan associations and other lending institutions, in addition to the currently permitted VA and FHA mortgages. The Department may purchase mortgages up to $42,000 per home at interest ceilings equal to the going rate on 6 to 12 year Treasury bonds plus one-half percentage point.

Home Loan Insurance (P.L. 93-117, approved October 2, 1973)—With the Federal Housing Agency's insuring authority expiring a second time this year (October 1), Congress authorized an extension of the FHA's authority to set government-insured mortgage interest rates and authorized funds for its basic Federal housing and urban development programs until October 1, 1974. Congress increased by $140 million the authority of the Secretary of HUD to enter into annual contracts with local housing authorities and extended the Secretary's authority to set maximum interest rates for FHA mortgages and Veterans Administration guaranteed loans. Authority for new community development guarantees was increased and various rural housing authorizations under the 1949 Housing Act (P.L. 81-171) were extended until October 1, 1974. Also extended until the October date were the authority of the Government National Mortgage Association to purchase mortgages, necessary to permit continuation of HUD's special tandem plan for low-income housing financing and the period in which the HUD Secretary is authorized to make rehabilitation loans. A total of $110 million for fiscal 1974 was authorized for comprehensive planning grants, $664 million for urban renewal, $63 million for open space, and $40 million for neighborhood facilities.

Housing and Mortgage Laws (H.J. Res. 512 reported from conference July 31, 1973. Conference report recommitment September 5, 1973)—Faced with a moratorium on low-income and middle-income housing imposed by the Administration in January 1973, Congress attempted to take action to terminate the moratorium and extend programs suspended on urban renewal, model cities, water and sewer and other community development projects. The bill also would have renewed the authority of the Secretary of HUD, to set mortgage rates for the FHA scheduled to expire June 30, 1973. When the President assured Congress of a veto, Congress passed an emergency measure (P.L. 93-85) extending the FHA insuring authority until Congress could approve a compromise bill, later to become P.L. 93-117 (above).

Inclusion of Interest and Legal Fees in Judgments of Subcontractors (H.R. 11691) passed the House May 20, 1974.—The House amended the "Miller Act" of 1935 in order to provide greater protection to certain subcontractors, particularly small businessmen, who might otherwise suffer from unnecessary financial losses when performing as subcontractors and material suppliers on Government contracts. The bill provides that interest and reasonable attorneys' fees are to be included in judgments in favor of subcontractors who bring actions to enforce their rights under payment bonds required by the Miller Act. Under the existing law, there is a lack of uniformity with regard to attorneys' fees and interest in Miller cases in the various States. As a result, in certain States a subcontractor suing under the Miller Act may receive attorneys' fees and interest but in another jurisdiction he would not. This bill would provide a desirable uniformity as to this subject. H.R. 11691 would also render unenforceable any provision in a contract between the prime contractor and the subcontractor, whereby the subcontractor purports to waive his rights under the Miller Act, including arbitration clauses. This provision aims at protecting the unknown subcontractor or the one who falls victim to the inequality of bargaining power.

INDIANS

Indian Financing Act (P.L. 93-262, approved April 12, 1974)—This Act comprises part of an Indian self-determination package to give Indians a greater degree of control in the administration of Federal programs for their benefit and economic independence based on the development and utilization of Indian resources. Under the Act, an Indian Revolving Loan Fund is established to be available for loans to Indians having a form of organization that is satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior, and to other eligible Indians. Loans may be made for any purpose which will promote the economic development of the individual Indian borrower, including loans for educational purposes and the economic development of the Indian organizations. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to guarantee up to 90 percent of the unpaid principal and interest due on any loan made to any organization of Indians or to individual Indians, or, in lieu of such guaranty, to insure such loans. The Secretary is also authorized to pay interest subsidies on loans which are guaranteed or insured under the provisions of Title II.

An Indian Business Development Program is established within the Department of the Interior for the purpose of stimulating and increasing Indian entrepreneurship and employment by providing equity capital to aid in establishing and expanding Indian-owned economic enterprises on or near reservations. Finally, the Act requires the Secretary to insure that any loan or grant applicant be provided with competent management and technical assistance consistent with the nature of the enterprise being funded. For the purpose of providing this assistance, the Secretary is authorized to cooperate with other Federal agencies in the use of existing programs of this character in those agencies, and to contract with private organizations for providing such services and assistance.

Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act (P.L. 93-638, approved January 4, 1975)—The concept of "Indian Self-Determination" means, in effect, a greater degree of Indian control in the administration of Bureau of Indian Affairs and Department of Health, Education and Welfare programs designed for the benefit of Indians, together with the encouragement of Indian economic self-sufficiency based on the development and full utilization of Indian resources.

P.L. 93-638 embodies the concept of Indian control of the administration of Federal programs, together with that of assistance in the area of Indian education. Title I of P.L. 93-638 clarifies and expands the authority of the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare (in the matter of Indian health service) to contract with Indian tribes and tribal organizations to operate Federally-funded programs on reservations. Title II of P.L. 93-638 further clarifies this authority, and provides, in addition, for increased Indian authority at the local level in approving or disapproving programs conducted under such contracts. Title II also authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to contract with State education agencies or school districts for the purpose of constructing or renovating facilities in school districts on, adjacent to, or near to, Indian reservations or other lands held in trust by the U.S. for Indians, when such facilities are necessary for the education of Indians living on such reservations or lands.

American Indian Policy Review Commission (P.L. 93-580, approved January 2, 1975)—Congress established an American Indian Policy Review Commission which is empowered with certain specific duties in regard to analyzing Federal Indian policy. Included in these duties is appointment of investigative task forces each to be composed of three persons, a majority of whom must be of Indian descent, to make preliminary investigations and studies in various specified areas of Indian affairs. The resolution directs that each task force must submit, within one year from the date of the appropriation of funds authorized therein, a report to the Commission. The Commission must then submit a report to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House within six months following completion of the reports submitted by the task forces.

Indian Judgment Funds Distribution Act (P.L. 93-134, approved October 19, 1973)—As approved by Congress, the Judgment Funds Distribution Act provides that all distributions of funds appropriated by Congress to pay judgments of the Indian Claims Commission and the Court of Claims to Indian tribes, bands, groups, pueblos, or communities shall be made pursuant to this Act. Accordingly, within six months after the vote of the appropriation of funds by the Congress to pay each Indian judgment, unless an extension is granted, the Secretary of the Interior is directed to prepare and submit to the Congress a recommended plan for the distribution of such funds. The Act further provides that such a plan shall become effective, and the distribution of judgment funds provided, upon expiration of a 60-day review period by Congress. Otherwise, should a committee resolution of either House disapprove the plan, the Secretary is required to propose legislation embodying such a plan.

Indians Claims Commission Authorization, FY 1974 (P.L. 93-37, approved May 24, 1973)—Congress authorized $1.2 million for the operation of the Indian Claims Commission increasing by $900,000, to $2.7 million the Expert Assistance Revolving Loan Fund, which enables Indian plaintiffs to borrow money at 5 percent interest to hire experts in the preparation of claims. Established in 1946, the Commission is to be terminated in 1977 at which time pending cases are to be transferred to the U.S. Court of Appeals.

Indian Claims Commission Authorization, FY 1975 (P.L. 93-494, approved October 27, 1974)—P.L. 93-494 authorized appropriations for the Indian Claims Commission for fiscal year 1975, not to exceed $1,450,000, to carry out the provisions of the Indian Claims Commission Act during fiscal year 1975. P.L. 93-494 also amends the Indian Claims Commission Act by adding the proviso that expenditures for food, rations or provisions may not be deemed payments on any claim.

Disposal Of Federal Property on Indian Reservations (P.L. 93-599, approved January 3, 1975)—This Act amends the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to provide for the disposal of excess or surplus Federal property located within Indian reservations to the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of any group, band or tribe of Indians which is eligible for services of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and who reside within those reservations on which the excess property is located. At the present time Federal property laws give no preferential rights to Indian tribes in obtaining Federal excess or surplus property located within the reservation. This bill would rectify that situation.

Menominee Restoration Act (P.L. 93-197, approved December 22, 1973)—Termination by Congress of Federal supervision over Federally-recognized Indian tribes in the 1950's and early 1960's was a policy which generated considerable controversy. Although the U.S. has since repudiated "termination" as a National Indian policy, six termination Acts (including the Menominee Termination Act) were enacted in 1954 and several more thereafter. Termination resulted in great economic hardship for some tribes, like the Menominee, and a general fear among Indians that the U.S. would abandon its responsibilities to them.

Thus the Menominee Restoration Act is landmark legislation in that it repeals the Menominee Termination Act of 1954 and reinstates all rights and privileges of the Menominee Tribe or its members under Federal treaty, statute, or otherwise—including Federal recognition and the right to all Federal services furnished American Indians because of their status as Indians.

This Act further provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall establish a membership roll of the tribe which is to include all members listed on the final 1954 roll who are still living and all descendants of persons listed on the 1954 roll if such descendants have at least one-quarter Menominee Indian blood; that the tribe shall organize a governing body for its common welfare and shall adopt an appropriate constitution and by-laws; that, subject to the approval of the shareholders as required by the laws of Wisconsin, the Board of Directors of Menominee Enterprises, Inc., shall transfer to the Secretary all assets held by such corporation; and that such assets shall be held in trust by the Secretary on behalf of the United States for the Menominee Tribe.

Navajo-Hopi Land Dispute (P.L. 93-531, approved December 22, 1974)—This Act effects a legislative solution to a land dispute between the Navajo and Hopi Indians which began more than a century ago. The land involved is that withdrawn from the public domain under an 1882 Executive Order for the use and occupancy of the Hopi and "such other Indians as the Secretary of the Interior may see fit to settle thereon." The area is now surrounded by the Navajo Reservation as established by Act of Congress in 1934.

The fact that the Executive Order set aside the area both for the Hopis and for "such other Indians as the Secretary of the Interior may see fit to settle thereon" gives rise to the conflicting claims of the two tribes.

December 20, 1974

In 1891 the Interior Department drew a boundary line reflecting the location of most of the Hopis within the 1882 Executive Order area, and the Navajos were forbidden to cross this line. The Navajos have conceded that the Hopis have exclusive rights to the land within this boundary. The dispute, therefore, is primarily in regard to the remainder of the 1882 Executive Order area.

In 1958 Congress authorized each tribe to institute or defend an action against the other "for the purpose of determining the rights and interests of such parties in and to said lands and quieting title in the tribes or Indians establishing such claims" pursuant to the 1882 Executive Order.

The result of this authorization was a 1962 decision (Healing v. Jones) of the District Court of Arizona which rules (1) that the Navajo and Hopi have joint, undivided and equal rights and interests in that portion of the 1882 Executive Order Area which lies outside the exclusive Hopi area ("Joint Use Area"); and (2) that the court did not have jurisdiction to partition this area jointly.

Further controversy stems from the fact that there are Hopi Indians living within the boundaries of the 1934 Navajo Reservation, which was established for the benefit of the Navajos and "such other Indians" as were already located thereon.

Thus this measure resolves this dispute by providing for a mediator and negotiating teams representing each tribe to settle the conflict. If these fail to find a solution, the Act authorizes the District Court of Arizona to make a final adjudication, which includes the possibility of partition of the Joint Use Area. The Act also provides for a judicial resolution of the dispute concerning the Moencopie area of the Navajo Reservation. The Act seeks, through various guidelines, to minimize the amount of population relocation which partition would require, as well as for partition in equal acreage and quality so far as is practicable. The Act directs that the subsurface rights in the Joint Use Area not be partitioned but continue under joint ownership.

LABOR AND IMMIGRATION

Minimum Wage Increase and Expansion (P.L. 93-259, approved April 8, 1974)—The enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1974 culminates a four-year effort to increase the minimum wage and to expand coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA). The Act provides a minimum wage level of $2.30 per hour for all covered workers. However, the schedule for reaching that level varies according to when the workers were first covered by the FLSA: (a) Workers covered prior to the 1966 FLSA amendments were set at $2.00 per hour effective May 1, 1974, at $2.10 per hour to begin January 1, 1975 and at $2.30 per hour to begin January 1, 1976; (b) Workers covered since the 1966 amendments received $1.90 per hour on May 1, 1974 and will receive $2.00 per hour on January 1, 1975, $2.20 per hour on January 1, 1976 and $2.30 per hour on January 1, 1977; (c) Farm workers, regardless of when they were covered, received $1.60 per hour on May 1, 1974, $1.80 per hour on January 1, 1975, $2.00 per hour on January 1, 1976, $2.20 per hour on January 1, 1977, and $2.30 per hour on January 1, 1978; and (d) Most workers in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands will receive increases, in stages, in the minimum wage of either $1.15 per hour, if their wage order rates are at or above $1.40 per hour, or $1.12 per hour, if their wage order rates are below $1.40 per hour, until parity with the mainland rates is achieved.

Coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act is broadened in three categories. First, the 1974 amendments cover all non-supervisory employees of Federal, state and local governments. The primary impact for these employees comes with regard to overtime provisions in which it is required that overtime pay be the compensation for every hour of overtime worked, whether previously authorized or not. The second category to be included are all private household domestic service workers who qualify for social security (earn wages from any employer amounting to more than $50.00 in any calendar quarter) or who, in any workweek are employed by one or more employers for more than eight hours in the aggregate. The amendments also broaden the coverage of farm laborers by including within the calculations for determining whether a farm meets the "500 man-day" test for coverage, work by local seasonal hand harvest laborers and children.

The 1974 amendments repeal or modify some minimum wage and overtime exemptions and create new ones. The minimum wage and overtime exemptions are repealed for employees of retail or service establishments which are part of enterprises which gross $250,000 or more annually in sales and employees of retail or service establishments who handle telegraph messages. The repealing section takes effect in stages. Minimum wage exemptions are repealed for motion picture theater employees, some logging employees, some agricultural employees engaged in tobacco processing, and employees of retail or service establishments or agricultural establishments which are part of so-called conglomerate employers. Overtime exemptions are repealed for some seasonal industry and agricultural processing employees, seafood canning and processing employees, oil pipeline employees, local transit employees, bowling establishment employees, food service and catering employees, certain partsmen and mechanics, and hotel and motel employees performing maid or custodial services. Overtime exemptions are modified for nursing home employees and certain hotel, motel and restaurant employees. New overtime exemptions are created for boat salesmen, certain houseparents for children residing in educational institutions, certain private household domestic service workers, and certain firefighting and law enforcement personnel.

Included in the Act also are provisions relating to students, to tip credit, to child labor and to prevention of age discrimination. Special Employment Assistance Act (P.L. 93-567, approved December 31, 1974)—Demonstrating its ability to react swiftly in a crisis situation, Congress passed the Special Employment Assistance Act authorizing 2.5 billion dollars to create 330,000 new jobs eleven days after it was first reported to the House floor. The Act rounds out a congressional emergency program designed to aid the Nation's growing unemployed which also includes an emergency extension of unemployment insurance giving up to fifty two weeks of benefits.

The Special Employment Assistance Act includes three different programs to provide benefits, the approximately 330,000 one year public service jobs authorized under Title I, an extension of unemployment benefits to workers not covered by State law in Title II, and a special job opportunities program for high unemployment areas in Title III.

The 2.5 billion dollars to create approximately 330,000 jobs will be used to hire jobless workers to perform community services in fields such as health, education, recreation and sanitation. The average annual wages for jobs created under the program would be about $7,800 for jobs running during calendar year 1975.

The extension of unemployment benefits to workers not covered by State law, will provide up to twenty-six weeks of benefits to unemployed workers at a rate equal to what they would receive if they were eligible under existing law. It was estimated that this program would cost 2.5 billion dollars at a 6.5% unemployment rate.

Title III of the new law attempts to create new jobs without creating another Federal agency to administer the program. The title authorizes the Secretaries of Commerce and Labor to monitor existing programs of the Federal Government to determine which have the most direct and immediate impact upon the creation of jobs and authorizes the Secretary of Commerce to provide up to 500 million dollars of assistance to programs which will contribute significantly to unemployment, and which can be initiated promptly and largely completed within twelve months.

Emergency Unemployment Act (P.L. 93-572, approved December 31, 1974)—Congress moved swiftly at the end of 1974 to provide extended benefits to the rapidly growing number of unemployed American workers. The Emergency Unemployment Act, passed in response to an unemployment rate which was climbing from a base of 6.5 percent of the work force, provides up to 52 weeks of unemployment benefits to affected workers.

The law accomplishes its goal of extending unemployment benefits by two major methods. First, it provides an extended thirteen weeks of unemployment benefits to workers who have exhausted their 26 weeks of regular benefits, and thirteen weeks of additional emergency benefits, making a possible total of 52 weeks of eligibility to workers who are particularly hard hit. Second, the law makes it easier for States to qualify for the program by lowering the "trigger" unemployment percentage to a level (4 percent of "insured" labor force) which would allow all 50 States to take advantage of the program beginning in January of 1975.

The legislation is essentially a modification of existing unemployment law. Under the provisions of the new law (which will be in effect until the end of 1976) the system requiring the States to provide the first 26 weeks of unemployment compensation will remain the same. The additional thirteen weeks of extended benefits will be paid for entirely by the Federal government if the "insured" unemployment rate falls within the range 4 to 4.5 percent for any three month period. If there is an "insured" unemployment rate of 4.5 percent or greater for any three month period, the provisions of other unemployment laws will come into effect where the States pay half the cost of extended benefits for the 13 weeks of additional compensation.

The new law provides for an additional "emergency" extension for another 13 week period for States with extended benefits programs. This program will be paid entirely from Federal funds.

The Emergency Unemployment Act also continues the suspension of the "120 percent trigger" mechanism which prevented Federal unemployment relief programs from coming into effect unless unemployment was rapidly rising. Proponents of this provision successfully argued that a high plateau of unemployment was as much a problem as rapidly rising unemployment. The new law also allows individual States to participate in the program even if the national "trigger" is not reached, if the individual States' unemployment percentages exceed the "trigger" percentages.

Under the previous guidelines less than a dozen States qualified for Federal unemployment aid. Under the new law all fifty States can qualify.

Comprehensive Manpower Act (P.L. 93-203, approved December 28, 1973)—To ease the rising unemployment threatened by the energy crisis, Congress approved a job training bill which develops a comprehensive national manpower policy and establishes a decentralized and decategorized manpower program responsive to local needs while maintaining necessary Federal direction and supervision. The Act establishes a program of financial assistance to State and local prime sponsors, enabling them to provide manpower services. Local prime sponsors are to include units of general local government with a population of 100,000 or more, combinations of such units which exceed 100,000, and certain rural areas without population requirements.

Included among the authorized manpower services are all programs and activities authorized under existing law. The Act provides a program of assistance to qualified prime sponsors and to Indian tribes or transitional public service employment in areas with a rate of 7 percent or more unemployment. Manpower services are also provided to segments of the population in particular need, including programs for Indians, migrant and seasonal workers, and youth. The Job Corps would be continued under the Secretary of Labor, who would be authorized to conduct programs of research, training, evaluation, labor market information and a computerized job bank. An open authorization was approved for fiscal 1974 through fiscal 1977.

National Labor Relations Act Amendments (P.L. 93-360, approved July 26, 1974)—Congress extended coverage and protection under the National Labor Relations Act to employees of nonprofit hospitals by providing new procedures governing labor relations in health care institutions. Through a more comprehensive definition of "health care" coverage includes hospitals, nursing homes, health maintenance organizations, extended care facilities, health and medical clinics and other similar institutions designed to care for the sick, infirm or aged.

Two significant changes provided by this Act are that it recognizes the need for uninterrupted patient care during a labor dispute, providing that a labor organization, before engaging in any strike, picketing, or other concerted refusal to work at any health care institution is to notify the institution and the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service of that intention in writing not less than ten days prior to such action. Second, the Act insures that no one may be coerced against her or his religious convictions into joining or financially supporting labor organizations, if such convictions are of a bona fide religious sect.

Farm-Labor Contractor Registration Act Amendments (H.R. 13342 vetoed by the President, October 29, 1974)—In an effort to protect migrant laborers from potential abuses by crew leaders and other contractors, Congress approved legislation (H.R. 13342) which extends coverage of the Farm Labor Contractor Registration Act to inter- and intra-State farm workers. The Act's provisions, directed to provide protections and remedies to workers subjected to farm labor contractor recruitment, contain revisions in penalty provisions to provide that criminal penalties are to apply to violations of the Act itself. Civil money penalties, imposed through the Secretary of Agriculture, are to apply to violations of regulations promulgated under the Act. The Act provides that a contractor who knowingly employs illegal aliens is to be fined a maximum of $10,000 or sentenced to a prison term not to exceed three years, or both, wherever the contractor is not duly registered under the Act. The use by another person of an unregistered farm labor contractor may result in the denial to that person of employment service facilities under the Wagner-Peyser Act. A private Federal remedy is created for violations of the Act or regulations.

Farm-Labor Contractor Registration Act Amendments (P.L. 93-518, approved December 7, 1974)—In a second effort to pass amendments to the Farm-Labor Contractor Registration Act, Congress deleted a provision contained in the original legislation that would have raised the position of certain hearing examiners to the level of administrative law judge. Because of inclusion of this provision in H.R. 13342 the President vetoed the bill. The Act, with all other provisions of H.R. 13342 (see above) also requires that farm labor contractors, in order to receive certification, prove that all housing and vehicles provided to farm laborers meet Federal and state health and safety laws.

Extended Unemployment Benefits (P.L. 93-53, approved July 1, 1973)—As an amendment to the first debt ceiling limitation bill, Congress passed provisions allowing States with annual unemployment rates of 4.5 percent and above to provide 13 weeks of extended benefits to unemployed workers during 1973 (to be financed by matching Federal and State funds) without regard to an existing law specifying that the level of unemployment in States had to increase by 20 percent over two years before States could provide the additional assistance. The provision, expected to affect six States, will provide extended benefits to an estimated 176,500 workers at a cost of $60.6 million to the Federal Government and $55.1 million to the States. As a part of the same debt ceiling bill, Congress approved an extension through fiscal 1974 of Federal project grants for maternal and child health programs. Direct grants had been scheduled to expire with the end of fiscal 1973 on June 30, 1973.

Railroad Retirement Amendments (P.L. 93-69, approved July 10, 1973)—While Congress made clear its intent to place the railroad retirement system on a permanent and sound financial basis before January 1, 1975, Congress passed a temporary solution to the retirement system's problems by implementing an agreement liberalizing eligibility requirements for railroad retirement and by extending benefit increases. Congress extended the three benefit increases enacted since 1970 to about one million railroad workers and their dependents through December 31, 1974, allowing employees to receive their full retirement benefits at age 60 after 30 years of service. Almost one half of the tax burden will be shifted from employees to employers to finance the retirement system, resulting in an increase in employer taxes from 10.6 percent to 15.35 percent of wages.

Jointly Administered Trust Funds for Legal Services (P.L. 93-95, approved August 15, 1973)—A far greater number of Americans will have access to legal services for a fixed fee as a result of legislation passed this year by Congress. Under a new system employers in business are authorized to contribute to jointly administered trust funds established by unions for the purpose of providing their members with prepaid legal services for tenant, debt, consumer, property, family relations and other matters. Previously, a legal services plan through collective bargaining could have been established only if the employer or a third party served as administrator. This legislation now makes legal services available to a large portion of the estimated 150 million American working people with moderate incomes who presently cannot afford the cost of adequate legal assistance. It is aimed at making legal services available to the blue-collar, middle-income working American, at a time when a great many Americans are not receiving adequate legal services. The Act also contains safeguards to prevent abuses by prohibiting suits against employers, except in workman's compensation cases, and by prohibiting suits against unions.

Immigration Limits (H.R. 981 passed House September 27, 1973)—The House voted to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 by imposing a worldwide limit on immigration visas of 20,000 annually per country. Priority would be given to those persons desiring to reunite with other members of their families and to persons with skills needed in the United States. A limit on immigration from Mexico and Canada would be established for the first time in U.S. history in an effort to establish a uniform treatment for all countries.

Enforcement of Customs and Immigration Laws, Increase Funds (P.L. 93-396, approved August 29, 1974)—The Act increases from $100,000 to $200,000 the limitation on the amount of funds that may be expended to provide for facilities for the enforcement of the customs and immigration laws along the land borders of the United States. The activities under the Act include the acquisition of land, and the construction of buildings, sheds, office quarters, and living facilities which are otherwise unavailable. During the House debate, it was pointed out that border facilities usually are erected in remote areas. Costs are increasing for these facilities due to the great distances that personnel and material must be transported to the job site. Also, along the Canadian border extreme weather conditions increase cost due to the short construction time during the limited summer season. The authorization had not been increased since 1962.

Repeal of the "Cooly Trade" Laws (P.L. 93-461, approved October 20, 1974)—This legislation repeals the "cool trade" laws, which prohibit the procuring, transportation, disposition, sale, or transfer of Oriental persons as servants or apprentices, or to be held to service or labor. These laws were enacted in 1862 and 1875 to correct the increasingly prevalent practice of exploitation of Oriental persons, particularly Chinese and Japanese, involving their procurement abroad for importation into the United States under contracts of servitude. These practices resulted not only in the violation of the individual rights of the persons so recruited, but also were disruptive to the working conditions in the areas into which they were imported.

The circumstances which prompted the "cool trade" legislation have long since ceased to be prevalent in the face of changes in the social, economic, and political conditions in the United States and abroad. The continued existence of the "cool trade" laws is also inconsistent with the later policies of the Congress under which other statutes singling out Oriental peoples have been repealed or modified by progressive amendments to the immigration laws.

The "cool trade" legislation currently serves no useful purpose in view of general civil rights legislation. It also presents an unnecessary and disparaging reminder of a past historical period which potentially could be the cause of misunderstanding as to the present relationships between the people of the United States and the people of Oriental countries.

LAW ENFORCEMENT AND CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

Law Enforcement Assistance Amendments (P.L. 93-83, approved August 6, 1973)—In an effort to reverse the alarming rise in crime, Congress authorized more than $2 billion to give local law enforcement officials in our neighborhoods the training and equipment they need to protect citizens against criminal acts. Congress quickly acted this session to extend the authorizations for the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration through fiscal year 1976, along with an extension of the Federal grant-giving authority of the LEAA for these three years. The Act provides for an expansion of the LEAA's mandate to include the improvement of criminal justice as well as law enforcement; increases the minimum state planning grants to $200,000 from $100,000, allowing planning grants to interstate metropolitan regional planning units; reduces all matching requirements to a single requirement that ten percent of the cost of an LEAA-funded project be met by State or local funds; establishes requirements for acceptable State programs; authorizes the LEAA to assist State and local police training programs and to act as a clearing-house for information relating to the improvement of law enforcement and criminal justice; and provides for termination of funds to any State discriminating in recruiting on the basis of color, national origin or sex. States are required to provide for the development and operation of alcoholism prevention and treatment programs as well as narcotic treatment programs in correctional facilities.

Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-415, approved September 15, 1974)—In order to provide a more efficiently coordinated Federal approach to the problems of juvenile delinquency in the United States, Congress established within the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration an Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, charged with the development and implementation of policy objectives for all Federal juvenile delinquency programs. Also established by the legislation is a Coordinating Council on Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention to coordinate all Federal programs in the area and a National Advisory Committee for Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention.

Congress authorized Federal grants covering up to ninety percent of the costs of approved state and local programs of education, training, treatment, prevention, research and rehabilitation of juvenile delinquency. Other provisions encourage the use of Federal funds in the development of new facilities and approaches by states, localities, and private agencies. The total amount authorized for these and related programs is $381 million through fiscal year 1977.

Narcotic Treatment Programs (P.L. 93-281, approved May 14, 1974)—Congress completed action this session on provisions designed to improve Federal control over methadone treatment programs by requiring annual registration with the Attorney General of anyone dispensing drugs with narcotics treatment programs. The registrants are required to comply with standards of record-keeping and security established by the Justice Department and with Department of Health, Education, and Welfare regulations concerning unsupervised use of narcotics in treatment programs. Failure to comply will result in suspension or revocation of authorizations by the Attorney General.

Judicial Disqualification (P.L. 93-512, approved December 5, 1974)—Congress for the first time has dealt with the problem of judicial disqualification in a comprehensive manner. Among the provisions of the new law is a general requirement that any referee in bankruptcy cases, magistrate, judge or justice disqualify him or herself in proceedings wherein his or her impartiality is open to question. Certain specific cases in which disqualification would pertain are enumerated. These include cases in which there was established a personal prejudice, a previous relationship with one of the lawyers, or a case in which the official had served as a counsel, adviser or material witness, or expressed an opinion while an employee of the United States Government. Other cases include those in which the judge is related to any of the parties or has financial interests which may be substantially affected by his or her ruling. The act also prohibits the waiving of any of these specific grounds for disqualification, and provides for a limited waiver for the general statement on disqualification.

Federal Rules of Evidence (P.L. 93-595, approved January 2, 1975)—Early in the Second Session, Congress approved legislation providing for a comprehensive codification of the rules on the admissibility of evidence in the Federal court system. The legislation was an outgrowth of the rules drafted by an advisory committee appointed twelve years ago by then Chief Justice Earl Warren. The original rules were released by the Supreme Court in November of 1972, and shortly thereafter Congress acted to secure its rights to revise them, as it deemed necessary, before they were to become effective.

The act thus produced retains a substantial number of the advisory committee's suggested rules but, among other changes, provides that questions of testimonial privileges and witness competency are to be governed by state law in civil cases, where such law supplies the rule of decision. It omits the rules providing for summing up and comment by the trial judge and presumptions in criminal cases, and contains a special provision for amendment of the rules by the Supreme Court.

Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure (P.L. 93-361, approved July 30, 1974)—This Act postpones for one year, until August 1, 1975, the effective date of certain proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure which were promulgated by the Supreme Court and transmitted to Congress under an order of the Supreme Court dated April 22, 1974, to allow Congress sufficient time to study these proposed amendments.

Controlled Substances Act Extension (No-Knock Repeal) (P.L. 93-481, approved October 26, 1974)—During the second session, Congress extended authorizations for appropriations for the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), a new agency designated by Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1973 to carry out all Federal drug law enforcement. The Act provides authorizations in the following amounts: $105 million for fiscal year 1975; $175 million for fiscal year 1976; and $200 million for fiscal year 1977. In amending section 509 of the Controlled Substances Act, the Act repeals authority of a judge or magistrate to issue search warrants relating to offenses involving controlled substances which authorize, under certain circumstances a police officer to break and enter a building in the execution of the search warrant without giving notice of his authority and purpose. It also amends title 23 of the District of Columbia Code to repeal the statutory authority of that title for an officer to break and enter in the execution of a search warrant or in making an arrest and to make, under certain specified circumstances, such break and entry without announcing his identity and purpose. Finally, the conference version extends the protection of title 18 U.S.C., making it a Federal offense to assault a Federal officer, to agents of the DEA acting within the lawful course of their duties.

Legal Education Fellowship Program for the Disadvantaged (P.L. 93-343, approved July 10, 1974)—Under this Act Congress provided that certain funds appropriated under the Higher Education Act of 1965 are to be used by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare for the purpose of supporting a program which will assist persons from disadvantaged backgrounds to prepare and receive education for the legal profession.

Commission on the Revision of the Federal Court Appellate System (P.L. 93-420, approved September 19, 1974)—Additional authorization of funds were provided in P.L. 93-420 for the already existing Commission on Revision of the Federal Court Appellate system. In addition, the deadline was extended for completion of its study on changes in structure and procedures of the Federal Courts of Appeal, from September 21, 1974, to June 21, 1975.

Jurisdiction of Civil Actions by Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities (P.L. 93-190, approved December 18, 1973)—Congress conferred jurisdiction on the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia with respect to certain civil actions brought by the Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities in order to enforce—or secure a declaration concerning the validity of—any subpoena or order issued by the Select Committee to the President, Vice President or other Federal officer for the production of information relevant to the Committee's function. The Select Committee was given authorization to prosecute such actions to enforce such subpoenas and orders issued by it, and to be represented by such attorneys as it may designate in any action under this Act. The legislation was needed because of a ruling in October by Judge John J. Sirica of the U.S. District Court that dismissed an action brought by the Select Committee to enforce its subpoenas requesting certain tape recordings which were in the possession of the President. The dismissal followed a finding that there was no statute upon which the suit could be based. This Act provided the necessary jurisdiction for the district court.

Watergate Grand Jury Extension (P.L. 93-172, approved November 30, 1973)—The Congress provided for two six-month extensions of the Watergate grand jury of the District of Columbia, which is hearing evidence concerning the break-in at the Democratic National Committee and related matters. Under current law, which limits grand juries to 18 months, the term of the Watergate grand jury was scheduled to expire on December 4, 1973. This measure made the first six-month extension mandatory but left the second extension to the discretion of the District Court if it determined that the business of the grand jury would not be completed at the end of the legislatively authorized time.

Federal Prisoners, Limits of Confinement (P.L. 93-209, approved December 28, 1973)—Both Houses passed legislation expanding existing law to permit more use of furloughs to aid prisoners in adjusting to non-prison community life. Existing law allows 30-day furloughs for work, training, or emergency circumstances. The Act allows furloughs for inmates to establish or re-establish family or community ties or for any other significant reason consistent with the public interest. Individuals would be carefully selected for the furloughs, and only non-dangerous inmates would be considered. The Senate passed the measure with an amendment authorizing a program of compensation for innocent victims of crime.

Speedy Trial Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-619, approved January 3, 1975)—This Act, representing over four years of study by the House and Senate, gives effect to the Sixth Amendment right to a speedy trial for persons charged with criminal offenses and reduces the danger of recidivism by strengthening the supervision over persons released pending trial. Under this legislation, time limit requirements are engaged for the initial stages in the criminal process. These limits are to be enforced by judges empowered to sanction prosecutors for delay by dismissing the indictment if trial does not occur within the limits and are empowered to sanction prosecutors for delay by dismissing deliberate dilatory tactics. The time limit, in addition to the sanctions system, is related to the appropriations process in the Congress so that each court can count on sufficient resources to achieve the goals set forth in the time limits by Congress.

Each Federal district court is required, in cooperation with the U.S. attorney and attorneys active in the defense of criminal cases in that district, to establish a plan for trying criminal cases within 100 days of arrest or receipt of summons. The Act is to take effect over a five year period so that the goals of the 30-day limit on the period between arrest and indictments and a 70-day limit on the period between indictment and commencement of trial will not be in force until the fifth year after enactment.

Starting the fifth year after enactment the 30-day arrest to indictment and 70-day indictment to trial time limits will be enforced by mandatory dismissal. In the first four years after enactment, the time limits are phased in beginning with a 60-day arrest to indictment and 180 days indictment to trial limit in the second year after enactment.

December 20, 1974

Every few years the time limits will be shortened and the sanctions for failure to meet the time limits will increase.

Copyright in Sound Recordings (P.L. 93-573, approved December 31, 1974)—This legislation establishes a National Commission on New Technological Uses of Copyrighted Works to study certain copyright issues which are not resolved in the general revision legislation. In addition, the new Act removes the expiration date for a limited copyright in sound recordings, increases the criminal penalties for piracy and counterfeiting of sound recordings, and extends the duration of copyright protection in certain cases.

SCIENCE AND ASTRONAUTICS

NASA Authorization, Fiscal 1974 (P.L. 93-74, approved July 23, 1973)—Congress reinstated several terminated and postponed space programs in the NASA Authorization Act for fiscal 1973. Among the space programs reinstated are the second Earth Resources Technology Satellite, postponed in January from late 1973 to 1976, to survey earth resources with cameras and sensors; an increase in programs of solar energy research; development of a quiet aircraft engine; development of a quiet, experimental short take-off and landing aircraft; and continuation of a program in space nuclear propulsion. The total authorization Congress approved was $288,650,000, an amount less than that authorized for NASA in fiscal 1973. Although it represents the lowest funding level for NASA since fiscal 1962, it is $48.5 million more than the amount requested by the Administration for fiscal 1974.

National Science Foundation Authorization, Fiscal 1974 (P.L. 93-96, approved August 16, 1973)—Congress authorized $635.6 million for the National Science Foundation in fiscal 1974, an amount $53 million more than the Administration requested. The main increases were approved for energy research, for other basic research programs, and for applied research science education and training. The measure requires the NSF to spend not less than $25 million for energy research programs, and authorizes additional amounts for earthquake prevention engineering, oceanography programs, institutional improvement of science, graduate student support, and for science education improvement. The Act also prohibits the Foundation from supporting research on live human fetuses outside the womb in the United States or abroad.

National Science Foundation Authorization, Fiscal 1975 (P.L. 93-43, approved September 14, 1974)—Recognizing the crucial importance of expanded scientific research and development programs to the Nation's advancement and well-being, the Congress approved legislation which authorizes $807,500,000 to the National Science Foundation for Fiscal Year 1975, along with an additional $5 million in foreign currencies which the Treasury Department considered surplus to the normal requirements of the United States.

Funds authorized will enable the NSF to continue its research programs covering a broad spectrum of scientific disciplines including atmospheric sciences, research science, oceanography, biological sciences, physics, chemistry, astronomy, mathematical sciences and the social sciences. Advanced scientific and technological projects of national and international significance and renown will also be continued. These include: The Global Atmospheric Research Program (GARP); the International Decade of Ocean Exploration Program; the Ocean Sediment Coring Program; the U.S. Antarctic Research Program; and the Energy Research and Development Policy Program.

The NSF will continue to fund programs of crucial national importance in the fields of education, information and energy research. In education, NSF will continue to support graduate student programs and fellowships awarded on the basis of national competitions in an effort to maintain standards of excellence in scientific research. NSF also provides support for the most outstanding research proposals submitted from universities, colleges and other research oriented institutions and makes grants on an annual basis for discretionary use by U.S. colleges and universities.

At the international level, NSF engages in cooperative scientific studies and undertakings with many foreign countries, and has an exchange program for scientists with 18 countries. The objective of this international scientific cooperation is to exchange information, provide U.S. scientists with opportunities to work on unique problems, and to reduce the cost to the U.S. of attacking global scientific problems.

NASA Authorization, Fiscal 1975 (P.L. 93-316, approved June 22, 1974)—The Congress authorized $3,266,929,000 for NASA operations for Fiscal Year 1975. Funding was allocated as follows: $2,372,815,000 for research and development, including funding for the space shuttle and space station programs; $144,490,000 for construction of facilities; and $749,624,000 for research and program management.

These levels of funding were approved in order to insure the continuance of high-level scientific and technical competence by retaining that agency's distinguished cadre of scientific personnel and its extensive network of sophisticated facilities and equipment required for space technology and other scientific areas critical to the Nation's needs.

Funding is provided for NASA's extraordinarily complex and far-ranging operations in space. These operations include important research undertakings in space life sciences, astronomy, weather and climate studies, pollution monitoring, and earth and ocean physics, among others.

NASA's research efforts have expanded greatly and have taken on promising new dimensions in recent years. Several of these new directions are in direct response to critical national needs. One such program is NASA's Meteorological Satellite Program which undertakes research on tornadoes and other violent short-term weather phenomena. Another is NASA's work on the development of turbine engines for automobiles and hydrogen injection in conventional automobile engines. This project is expected to yield major dividends in energy conservation, and in the development of effective ground propulsion systems with clean emission characteristics. A third program involves NASA's coal-related research programs which seek more efficient ways to mine coal, improve mine safety, achieve greater equipment reliability, and insure efficient non-polluting conversion of coal energy to electric power.

SOCIAL WELFARE

Employee Retirement Income Security Act (P.L. 93-406, approved September 2, 1974)—Congress enacted a landmark pension reform measure with the passage of H.R. 2. The law will regulate private pension plans that now hold more than $150 billion in assets and cover an estimated 25 million persons. The law does not require businesses or unions to establish pension funds, but it will govern most such funds that are created, and it will apply to most existing private pension funds.

Provisions of the law set pension fund standards for eligibility, vesting, funding, fiduciary responsibility, and reporting and disclosure. An insurance program is established to protect employee benefits and tax incentives are granted to encourage the establishment of retirement accounts by the self-employed or employees not covered by pension plans. Certain provisions for portability are outlined.

In general, employees must be allowed to participate if they are 25 years old and have at least one year of service. However, if the plan provides full and immediate vesting for all participants, it may require employees to be age 25 with 3 years of service in order to participate.

Pension plans must provide full and immediate vesting in benefits derived from employee contributions. With respect to employer contributions, the plan must meet one of three standards: (a) full 100 percent vesting after 10 years of service; (b) graded vesting with 25 percent vesting attained after 5 years of covered service, increasing by 5 percent for each of the next 5 years, and 10 percent for each year thereafter so that 100 percent vesting is attained in 15 years; (c) graded vesting with 60 percent vesting attained when the age and years of service of the employee total 45, increasing by 10 percent over each of the next 5 years except that employees with 10 years service must be 50 percent vested and be granted an additional 10 percent vesting for each year thereafter.

Participation and vesting requirements must be met immediately for any plan set up after January 1, 1975. Plans in existence before January 1, 1974, must comply by their first anniversary date after December 31, 1975.

The minimum funding requirements of the law are designed to assure the solvency of private pension plans. These requirements do not apply, however, to profit-sharing or stock bonus plans which do not specify the amount of benefits participants are to receive.

Plan sponsors must fund all normal costs currently with past service liabilities amortized over 30 years in most instances. Plans already in existence may amortize unfunded past service liabilities over 40 years. In general, experience deficiencies are to be amortized over no more than 15 years. Multi-employer plans may amortize past service liabilities over 40 years and experience deficiencies over 20 years. Funding requirements may be waived, however, if an employer demonstrates a substantial "business hardship."

The effective dates of the funding requirements are the same as for participation and vesting except that collectively bargained plans created prior to January 1, 1974 are not included until the expiration of the last of the governing contracts or December 31, 1980.

The law tightens existing laws regarding fiduciary responsibility to prevent the misuse of pension funds. Standards and remedies similar to those of traditional trust law are provided. Transactions which are likely to endanger the interests of plan participants are strictly prohibited. Plan investments must meet a diversification requirement with no more than 10 percent of a fund's assets invested in an employer's securities.

P.L. 93-406 establishes a mandatory system of plan termination insurance which is to be administered by a Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation within the Department of Labor and which will be financed by premiums paid by covered plans. For the first year, single employer plans will pay $1 into the insurance fund for each participant and multi-employer plans 50 cents per participant. Thereafter premiums are to be based on a formula. The insurance covers participant's benefits to a maximum of $750 a month. Solvent employers are liable to the insurance corporation for any loss incurred due to plan termination up to 30 percent of the employer's net worth.

Each pension plan, unless specifically exempted, is to report detailed financial and actuarial data annually to the Secretary of Labor. Annual reports detailing assets, liabilities, and certain transactions are required. Plan sponsors also are required to supply enrolling participants with a summary of all provisions and benefits with summaries updated at least every 10 years. However, if the plan is modified materially, a new summary must be distributed within 210 days after the end of the plan year in which the change is made. Plan sponsors also are required to give each participant a statement of his vested rights and, effective in 1976, a summary of his pension benefits when he withdraws from the plan.

The law also makes provisions for retirement accounts for persons not covered by pension plans. Beginning in 1975, these taxpayers may deduct for income tax purposes the amount of their contributions to a qualified individual retirement account up to 15 percent of their earnings or $1,500. Self-employed persons may deduct up to 15 percent or $7,500 of earnings from taxable income for retirement plans. At present, self-employed individuals can deduct only 10 percent or $2,500 a year. A special provision designed to meet the needs of small business taxpayers allows self-employed individuals to deduct up to $750 regardless of percentage limitations.

Portability provisions of the law provide that an employee leaving a job may transfer his vested pension benefits to an individual retirement account within 60 days. If his next employer agrees, he may then transfer the funds in the account to the employer's pension fund.

Legal Services Corporation Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-355, approved July 25, 1974)—Congressional approval of the Legal Services Corporation Act of 1974 ended a three-year legislative struggle to transfer the legal services program from the Office of Economic Opportunity to an independent corporation. This Act establishes an independent Legal Services Corporation in the District of Columbia to provide legal assistance to the poor in non-criminal proceedings. The Corporation will be governed by an 11-member board of directors appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. At least six of the directors must be lawyers, and no more than six may be members of the same political party. The Act authorizes the President to select the first chairman of the corporation, who will serve a three year term. Thereafter, the chairman will be elected by the members of the Board from among their members.

Within six months of its first meeting, the Board must request each governor to appoint a nine-member advisory council for his State. A majority of the advisory council members in each State must be members of the appropriate State bar association, and the governors are required to solicit the recommendations of State bar associations for council membership.

The President of the Corporation, who is appointed by the Board and also serves on the Board as a non-voting member, is authorized to hire employees for the corporation, who are exempted from laws and executive orders affecting agencies of the federal government, and are not considered employees of the Federal Government except for pension and other benefits. They are protected by a provision forbidding the use of any political test or political qualification in selection, hiring, promotion, and other personnel actions. Political tests or qualifications are also barred in the selection and monitoring of recipients, grantees, and contractors. Members of the Board are barred from participating in any decision affecting a law firm or organization with which they have been associated within the previous two-year period.

Under the law, the corporation is authorized to make grants and contracts to individuals, law firms and other organizations in order to provide legal services to the poor. It can make grants and contracts to local and State governments if the Board determines that legal services could not be provided through non-governmental arrangements. The Corporation itself can undertake research, training and information programs related to poverty law, but it is barred from making grants or contracts to outside groups such as universities for the same type of activities. To the extent possible, the Corporation is required to use lawyers speaking appropriate languages for clients who do not speak English, and is also required to establish income guidelines for eligible clients in consultation with State governors and the director of the Office of Management and Budget.

Community Services Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-644, approved January 4, 1975)—The Community Services Act of 1974 would resolve the continuing controversy surrounding the fate of the Office of Economic Opportunity by repealing the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964 and providing for the continuation of most of the programs authorized under that Act, including the Community Action Program, by a new Community Action Administration. The Administration, to be established in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, would be headed by a Director to be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The level of Federal support for Community Action programs would be changed to 80 percent for fiscal year 1975, 70 percent for fiscal year 1976, and 60 percent for fiscal year 1977. A total of $330 million is authorized for fiscal year 1975. In addition, the Act establishes a new Incentive Grant program, with an authorization of $50 million for fiscal 1975, that is designed to encourage Community Action Agencies to secure new local dollars. The local incentive grants will provide Federal matching funds on a dollar-for-dollar basis. Separate authorizations of $500 million, $525 million and $550 million for fiscal years 1975, 1976, and 1977 are provided for the Headstart program, and an additional $60 million each year for the Follow Through program.

The formula by which Community Action funds are allocated among the States would be changed. Previously, the formula was based on 1) the number of public assistance recipients in each State; 2) the average number of unemployed persons in each State; and 3) the relative number of related children living with families with incomes of less than $1,000 in each State. The bill changes the third portion of that allocation formula by substituting the Orshansky poverty index criteria for the $1,000 income level. The Orshansky poverty index is a fluctuating level based on the latest census data and reflects size of family, farm or non-farm location, and sex of the head of the household. To prevent the change in formula from resulting in a drastic shift of funds among the States, the Act limits any State's loss to one-half of one percent of its share of the total allocation in fiscal 1974.

The Community Services Act makes official the transfer of authority for the Headstart and Follow Through programs from the Office of Economic Opportunity to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, a transfer that was accomplished administratively in 1969. Also transferred to HEW are the Comprehensive Health Services program and a three-year authorization of Human Services Policy Research, which provides broad policy research on questions of employment, income maintenance, etc. and basic research on the extent and causes of poverty.

Under the Act, the Community Economic Development program is transferred to the Department of Commerce, and Migrant programs under Title II (B) are transferred to the Department of Labor.

Other programs authorized by the Community Services Act of 1974 include: the Community Food and Nutrition Program; Environmental Action; Rural Housing Development and Rehabilitation; Senior Opportunities and Services; Design and Planning Assistance; Youth Recreation and Sports Program; Consumer Action and Cooperative Program; Technical Assistance and Training; State Agency Assistance; Rural Loan Program; and Native American Program.

Food Stamp Eligibility (P.L. 93-335, approved July 9, 1974)—Congress extended food stamp eligibility of supplemental security income (SSI) recipients for 12 months until July 1, 1975, ensuring that millions of needy blind, disabled, and aged persons in 45 States would continue to receive food stamps. This action also assured persons in the five states which had chosen to substitute cash for food stamps under the provisions of the SSI program that they would receive the full cash equivalent of the food stamp bonus.

Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act (P.L. 93-247), approved January 31, 1974)—In the past, Federal activity in the area of child abuse prevention has been largely confined to financial assistance to the States for child welfare and social service and for research grants under the Social Security Act. The Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act provides for the establishment of a National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, which will publish an annual summary of research on child abuse and neglect; maintain an information clearinghouse on successful public and private programs for the prevention and treatment of child abuse; compile and publish training materials for personnel involved in child abuse prevention and treatment; provide technical assistance to public and nonprofit private agencies in planning, improving, developing and conducting child abuse prevention and treatment programs; conduct research into the causes, and prevention and treatment of child abuse, and make a complete study of the national incidence of child abuse and neglect.

Under the Act, at least 50 percent of the funds authorized are to be used in a program of grants and contracts to public and nonprofit private agencies for demonstration programs and projects designed to prevent, identify, and treat child abuse and neglect. These grants or contracts can be made for the development and establishment of training programs, for the establishment and maintenance of centers to provide a broad range of services related to child abuse and neglect, for furnishing teams of trained personnel on a consulting basis to small communities where child abuse prevention and treatment facilities and services are not available, and for other innovative programs and projects.

At least 5 percent and not more than 20 percent of the funds authorized are to be distributed in grants to the States to assist the States in developing, strengthening and carrying out child abuse and neglect prevention and treatment programs. In order to qualify for such grants, the States must have functioning laws, programs, facilities, services, and personnel in the field of child abuse prevention and treatment.

The Act authorizes an appropriation of $20 million for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1975 and $25 million for fiscal 1976 and 1977.

Runaway Youth Act (P.L. 93-415, approved September 7, 1974)—Recognizing the responsibility of the Federal Government to develop accurate reporting of the national problem of runaway youth and to develop an effective system of temporary care for runaway youth outside the law enforcement structure, Congress included the Runaway Youth Act as Title III of the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974.

The Act authorizes the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to make matching grants (of 90 percent) and provide technical assistance to localities and nonprofit agencies for the purpose of developing local facilities to handle the immediate needs of runaway youth in a manner outside the juvenile justice system. For each of the next three fiscal years, $10,000 is to be appropriated for these grants.

The size of each grant will be determined by the number of runaway youth that has been shown to frequent a community and the existing availability of services. Each runaway facility will provide temporary shelter and counseling services to juveniles who have left home without permission of their parents or guardians; have plans for contacting a youth's parents or guardians (if such action is required by State law) and assuring the safe return of the youth according to his best interests; for contacting local government officials pursuant to informal arrangements with such officials; for providing other appropriate alternative living arrangements; for assuring proper relations with law enforcement personnel and the return of runaway youth from correctional institutions; and keep statistical records on the youths, which will not be disclosed without parental consent to anyone other than another runaway agency or government agency compiling statistical records.

Research on Aging of 1974. (P.L. 93-296, approved May 31, 1974)—In spite of Administration opposition, Congress created a National Institute on Aging, within the National Institutes of Health, for the conduct and support of biomedical, social, and behavioral research and training relating to the aging process, diseases, and other special problems and needs of the aged.

The Act, which amends the Public Health Services Act of 1944, establishes a National Advisory Council on Aging to consult with and make recommendations to the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare on programs related to the aged; authorizes scientific studies through the Institute to determine the impact on aging of programs conducted or assisted by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare; authorizes preparation (within one year) of a comprehensive aging research plan for presentation to Congress and the President; and calls for public information and education programs to disseminate the findings of the Institute and other information in order to assist all Americans in understanding the problems and processes associated with aging.

In October 1972 a similar measure was pocket vetoed by the President who contended that such an institute would duplicate current research efforts in the field of aging. P.L. 93-296 directs the Secretary of HEW to allocate aging research functions in cases where the activities of several health institutes overlap.

Authorization for the Nutrition Program for the Elderly (P.L. 93-351, approved July 12, 1974)—In amending the Older Americans Act of 1965, Congress voted to continue nutrition programs for the elderly, first authorized in 1972. The Act authorizes $600-million over the next three fiscal years to provide persons age 60 or older with one hot meal a day, five days a week. It is estimated that by fiscal 1977, the funds will pay for 532,000 meals a day—more than doubling the number of meals served in fiscal 1974.

The Act also requires all programs under the Older Americans Act to be carried out only by the Commissioner on Aging within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare or officials directly responsible to him; authorizes $35-million in fiscal 1975 in formula grants to the States for transportation programs for the elderly, with emphasis on transportation needed in connection with nutrition programs and those areas with inadequate or no public transportation; amends the Domestic Volunteer Service Programs Act (P.L. 93-113) by imposing restrictions on the establishment of local share requirements for the Retired Senior Volunteer Programs (RSVP) conducted by the ACTION agency; and requires the Secretary of Agriculture to provide food commodity assistance to the nutrition programs with a value of at least ten cents per meal (adjusted annually for inflation).

The Administration supported a continuation of the nutrition programs, but recommended an open-ended authorization and a one-year extension.

Older Americans Service Amendments (P.L. 93-29, approved May 3, 1973)—On its own initiative Congress greatly expanded benefits for our older Americans although President Nixon had pocket vetoed similar legislation in October 1972. In enacting P.L. 93-29, Congress extended and expanded Federal grants for programs to assist the elderly, authorized under the Older Americans Act of 1965, through fiscal 1975. The compromise legislation removes the Administration on Aging from HEW's Social and Rehabilitation Service and places it directly under the Secretary of HEW. It establishes a national information clearinghouse on the aging to collect, analyze and distribute information on the needs of older Americans. The Act also provides Federal grants to States and communities for social service programs for the aged and authorizations for grants for training and research in the field of aging, and for acquisition and staffing of multi-purpose senior citizen centers. Funds are also authorized for the National Older Americans Volunteer Program, Foster Grandparents, and other senior volunteer programs.

Disability Benefits (P.L. 93-256, approved March 28, 1974)—In passing P.L. 93-256, Congress ensured the continued payment of Federal supplemental security income (SSI) benefits to all disabled persons transferred from state welfare programs that were replaced by the SSI program in January, 1974. The act extended the deadline for establishing eligibility under the new SSI program from March 31 to December of 1974. An amendment to the original bill also provided for a three-month extension (to July 1, 1974) of the provisions of P.L. 93-233, which permits states to participate in the extended unemployment compensation program if the rate of insured unemployment in the state is at least 4 percent, without regard to the requirement of permanent law that the insured unemployment rate also must have increased by 20 percent over the prior two years.

Social Security Benefit Increases (P.L. 93-233, approved December 31, 1973)—To help senior citizens to keep up with the cost of living and face the impact of a record-breaking inflation in 1973, Congress approved a two-step social security increase which will raise benefits for 29 million Americans by eleven percent by June 1974, rising by seven percent in April and by an additional four percent in July. To finance this increase the social security wage base will go from this year's $10,800 to $13,200 on January 1, but the social security tax rate, which is 5.85 percent for both employee and employer, will not change. The average monthly benefit for elderly couples will increase from the present $277 to $310.

Social Security Consolidation of Federal Assistance (P.L. 93-647, approved January 4, 1975)—The Social Services Amendments of 1974 amends the Social Security Act to establish a consolidated program of Federal financial assistance to encourage provision of services by States, and clearly define State and Federal responsibilities with respect to social services. This measure attempts to provide States with a basis on which they can make continuing program plans. It does not increase the Federal expenditure limits which were established for social services as part of the general revenue sharing legislation of 1972; and it does not affect the allocation of this money to States or the share of expenditures which the Federal Government will provide.

It sets broad goals for social services and provides that at least half of the funds expended shall be for recipients or persons eligible for Aid to Families with Dependent Children, supplemental security, income, or medical. Maximum income limitations are set for both free services and services for which a fee is imposed related to the individual's ability to pay. No State is required to go to any of these levels. State plans to be approved by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare would deal with such items of program structure as fair hearings, confidentiality of information, designation of the administering agency, the absence of durational residence or citizenship requirements and minimum standards for institutions and facilities.

The bill relies heavily on a State planning process in which the State will determine what services to provide and to whom. Although the Secretary of HEW would approve the process, he would not be authorized to deny Federal funds on the basis that a program was not a service or was not directed to one of the general goals. Each State would be required to conduct advance planning for each service program year, conduct evaluations, and provide reports of the effectiveness of this program to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare and the public. An annual program report would be issued at the close of each program year, and States would be required to make provisions for audits.

In order to protect against Federal funds supplanting State funds, provisions are contained requiring a non-Federal share of expenditures in a State to be at least equal to that in fiscal year 1973 or 1974—which ever is lower.

Supplemental Security Income (P.L. 93-66, approved July 9, 1973)—Amendments enacted earlier in the First Session by Congress provide for a boost in payments for up to six million needy blind, disabled and aged persons. The effective date in P.L. 93-66 is stated as July, 1974. However in subsequent legislation Congress set January, 1974 as the effective date which is when the Federal Government takes over the State welfare programs assisting these persons. This Act protects current beneficiaries from any loss of payments as a result of the changeover.

Domestic Volunteer Service Programs (P.L. 93-113, approved October 1, 1973)—In keeping with the American spirit of assistance to those less fortunate in our society, Congress authorized funds for our domestic volunteer programs including VISTA, the university year action, the retired senior volunteer program, the service corps of retired executives, and the foster grandparent program. For the first time, Congress has given legislative authority to ACTION, created through an executive reorganization plan in 1971 to coordinate the Peace Corps and all other domestic volunteer programs sponsored by the Federal Government, and has consolidated all domestic volunteer programs sponsored by the Federal Government under one Act. Congress also has provided for several new voluntary activities designed to place special emphasis on the problems of poverty and other human social and environmental problems. Among these are the senior companions program and a program for senior health aides. Emphasis is placed on encouraging minority group participation in all of the programs administered under the Act.

Trade Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-618, approved January 3, 1975)—The Congress completed action on a major overhaul of trade legislation which President Ford had termed "essential to the future of the United States' trade policy and that of the world as well." He expressed his belief that "The health of our domestic economy and the strength, the very structure, of our international economic relations are involved."

December 20, 1974

The legislation makes possible American participation in worldwide trade negotiations, scheduled to begin in February 1975, by providing broad authority for the President to act on trade matters.

Among the powers granted to the President by the legislation is authority to conclude trade agreements, adjust tariffs, renegotiate the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, grant most-favored-nation status to Communist countries not restricting emigration, and respond to import restrictions imposed by other countries. The act provides, however, for congressional oversight of certain kinds of negotiated agreements or presidential trade decisions. For example, no more than $300 million in U.S. loans, guarantees, and insurance can be committed without prior congressional approval. The legislation also makes it easier for American industries to receive relief from foreign competition and further provides for assistance to companies, workers, and communities adversely affected by imports.

The Act contains restrictions on the authority of the President to grant most-favored-nation status to nations not permitting free emigration, denying such status unless the President waives such provision on the basis of assurances from a nation that it was moving in the direction of free emigration policies. The President was also authorized to deny most-favored-nation status to Communist countries not cooperating in locating and returning American personnel missing in Southeast Asia.

Export-Import Bank (P.L. 93-646, approved January 4, 1975)—Congress approved an authorization for the Export-Import Bank to continue, through June 30, 1978, making loans to finance exports of American products. One provision of the legislation requires congressional notification in advance of loans of more than $60 million to any nation. Further, a limit of $300 million was placed on financing for exports to the Soviet Union, and, within that limit, only $40 million could be expended on research and exploration of Soviet fossil fuels. The bank's overall loan, guarantee, and insurance authority was increased from $20 billion to $25 billion.

Export Administration (P.L. 93-500, approved October 29, 1974)—Among the major changes in U.S. export policies which S. 3792 accomplishes are the following:

First, it authorizes the President to use export controls to secure the removal of unreasonable restrictions by other countries on access to vital commodities. This will enable the President in cooperation with other nations, to stand up to the international oil cartel which is threatening to destroy the international monetary system and is a major cause of worldwide inflation. It will permit the President to stand up to other cartels. It will give the President power to bargain with countries which band together to set artificially high prices for essential resources. It will give him power to respond effectively to countries which use their control over essential resources to attempt to change U.S. foreign policy. It will help stop the dangerous drift toward cartels and artificially rigged prices and helps restore competition to the international marketplace.

Second, the legislation provides for an early warning system for dealing with shortages. It requires the Secretary of Commerce to establish a systematic export monitoring system. Monitoring will start when export levels of essential commodities—such as fertilizer for our farmers—cause serious adverse economic effects at home. Monitoring of export levels will be accompanied by periodic public analysis of worldwide supply, prices, and demand for commodities in short supply.

This will permit the Government to identify shortages before they materialize, and devise measures to alleviate such shortages without disruption in the marketplace or hardship to the American producer and consumer.

Third, the bill authorizes a new tool for administering export controls—the use of export fees.

This is not new control authority; it is a tool for administering controls when and if they become necessary. When used, it will avoid the need for export quotas and permit a higher export price to allocate U.S. commodities in short supply in foreign markets. It will also provide a means of dealing with artificial price rigging by other nations. The threat of fees on exports to countries which have imposed embargoes or unreasonably increased prices on exports to the United States may be an effective bargaining tool.

Fourth, the bill establishes procedures for granting hardship relief to those at home and abroad who suffer a unique hardship as a result of export controls.

Fifth, the bill establishes speeded-up procedures for processing export license applications.

International Economic Policy Extension (P.L. 93-121, approved October 4, 1973)—Congress extended for four years—until June 30, 1977—the Council on International Economic Policy whose statutory authority expired June 30. The Council coordinates the efforts of more than 60 Federal agencies or other units involved in some aspect of foreign economic affairs. It focuses on international economic policy issues and recommends policies consistent with domestic economic policy and basic foreign policy objectives. P.L. 93-121 requires Senate confirmation of any future Executive Directors of the Council, exempting the present Director, Peter Flanigan. The measure also removes the President from the Council, while allowing him to appoint a chairman from among its members, and adds the Secretary of Transportation as a new member. A total of $1.4 million was authorized for fiscal 1974 for the Council's operations.

International Economic Policy, Council Funds (P.L. 93-315, approved June 22, 1974)—For economic policy formation in the international field, the President relies upon a specialized cabinet level group, the Council on International Economic Policy (CIEP). The President and the Council are served by a staff under an executive director who is also an assistant to the President.

CIEP was created by presidential memorandum in January, 1971, on the recommendation of the Advisory Council on Executive Organization, to improve the coordination of U.S. Government agencies with responsibilities in the field of foreign economic affairs. The Congress first authorized the CIEP in the International Economic Policy Act of 1972 in P.L. 92-412 of August 29, 1972, and granted further authorization in P.L. 93-121.

The Council and its staff are formed to achieve a clear, top-level focus on the broad range of international economic policy issues. It is the function of CIEP to help assure that all factors affecting international economic policy are more fully considered and that policy decisions are based on realistic assessments of U.S. foreign economic interests. Another objective of CIEP is consideration of these policy choices in the context of both domestic economic development and our broad foreign policy objectives. The CIEP staff is used by the Council and its executive director to coordinate the efforts of individual agencies and to synthesize the sometimes divergent policy recommendations forwarded by them.

Among the important issues in which the Council was involved during 1973 were negotiations on trade and monetary reform; new international agreements on the treatment of foreign investment; the impact of U.S. banking and securities regulations on international investment patterns; U.S. policy on expropriations of U.S. investments by foreign governments; problems associated with the transfer of U.S. technology abroad; export controls on agricultural and industrial commodities in short supply, and East-West trade policy.

P.L. 93-315 authorizes to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary until the expiration of the provisions of the International Economic Policy Act of 1972, as amended, to June 30, 1977.

These, and other reforms in this legislation, will provide increased flexibility in U.S. export policy, strengthen U.S. export potential, permit the U.S. to respond effectively to rapidly changing international economic conditions, and help assure the access of all nations to scarce resources.

Foreign Investment Study (P.L. 93-479, approved October 26, 1974)—This legislation (S. 2840) authorizes and directs the Secretaries of Commerce and the Treasury to undertake a comprehensive study of foreign direct and portfolio investments in the United States and to report to the Congress on the results of their study. The Secretaries shall identify and collect information necessary to the study, consult with and secure information from representatives of non-governmental agencies and organizations. Not more than $3 million is authorized to carry out the purposes of the act.

TRANSPORTATION AND COMMUNICATIONS

Federal Aid Highway Act (P.L. 93-87, approved August 13, 1973)—Congress has approved a precedent-setting highway construction bill which, for the first time since the Federal highway program was established in 1956, allocates funds for urban mass transit. Cities will be permitted by 1976 to finance a portion of their urban mass transit projects, including subways, from the Highway Fund. The Act extends highway programs, including the interstate system, for three years (1974-1976) and includes authorizations to be drawn from the trust fund, totaling $6,049,000 for fiscal 1974, $6,851,000 for fiscal 1975 and $7,010,000 for fiscal 1976. Also for the first time, the urban share of Highway Trust Fund authorizations match authorizations for rural highway needs for the three-year period of the bill, at a level of $10.7 million in fiscal 1974 and $11 million for each of fiscal 1975 and 1976. Along with the trust funds authorized for mass transit, Congress approved additional contract authority for the Urban Mass Transportation Administration in the Transportation Department for grants and loans to States and local public bodies for mass transit projects.

Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-643, approved January 4, 1975)—At the height of the 1973 fuel shortage Congress temporarily lowered the maximum speed limit in the United States to 55 miles per hour until June 30, 1975. As anticipated the rate of fuel consumption has been reduced in the year which has followed. Of far greater significance, however, is the 20 per cent decline in traffic fatalities on the Nation's highways during the first half of 1974 which in a large part have been attributed to slower driving habits. Against this positive background the 2nd session of the 93rd Congress has with the passage of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1974 made the 55 miles per hour speed limit a permanent law.

Other provisions of this Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1974 provide for an increase in the permissible weight of trucks from 73,280 pounds (which was established in 1956) to 80,000 pounds, and repeals the Federal regulation requiring that new cars beginning with the 1974 model year be equipped with a seat belt ignition interlock system. The bill also places further restrictions on billboards, provides funds for school bus driver training programs, and permits wider buses on interstate highways.

Urban Mass Transportation (P.L. 93-503, approved November 26, 1974)—For the first time ever, both Houses of Congress approved legislation offering deficit-ridden, urban mass transit Federal subsidies for operating expenses to supplement revenues derived from passenger fares. This legislation provides authorizations of $11.9-billion over six years. The assistance under the legislation is to be made on a formula based upon the following three factors: population of the area served by the mass transportation system; total number of revenue population carried by the system; and total revenue vehicle miles traveled by the system. The three factors for each eligible applicant are to be weighed against all eligible applicants. Mass transportation systems receiving benefits under the operating subsidy provision must provide half fare for the elderly and handicapped during non-peak hours. House and Senate conferees agreed to provide $11.8 billion to carry out the intent of the legislation. This authorization includes $7.8 billion to assist in purchasing buses and building rail transit systems, and nearly $4 billion to subsidize the upward-spiraling deficits of existing programs. The measure endorsed by the conferees would require that the $7.8 billion capital fund be spent for physical improvements and would allow the cities to decide whether to use the $4 billion for either capital or operating subsidies. In no instance can the subsidy money be used to pay more than half of any transit system's deficits.

Surface Transportation Act of 1974 (H.R. 5385 passed the House December 10, 1974)—Freight car shortages have long plagued users of railroad transportation. Since as early as 1987 shippers have frequently turned to Congress for solutions to the freight car problem. Although Congress, the Interstate Commerce Commission and the railroad industry have tried many cures over the years, poor freight car availability continues to disrupt the flow of the Nation's commerce. Since neither strictly voluntary action by the industry nor additional regulation have brought about effective solutions in the past the 93rd Congress in approving the far reaching Surface Transportation Act of 1974 has sought a legislative middleground.

The Act makes available up to $2 billion in government guaranteed loans for capital improvements, prohibits discriminatory taxation of transportation by the States, provides a greater flexibility in the rate structure of carriers, abolishes the practice whereby government agencies are permitted to ship goods at a lower price, and prohibits a railroad from refusing to carry a privately owned refrigerator car if they do not have a sufficient refrigerator car to haul the goods themselves. With the enactment of this bill the Interstate Commerce Commission is required to submit its budget directly to Congress rather than through the Office of Management and Budget, and the ICC is required to consider the impact of rail abandonments on the communities and industries served as well as the financial impact on the railroad. In an attempt to avoid in the future the fraud which surrounded the Penn Central bankruptcy, the securities of railroads and large truckers will be subject to SEC laws.

Anti hijacking Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-366, approved August 5, 1974)—Through the provisions of the Anti hijacking Act of 1974 the President of the United States is authorized to suspend air service to any foreign nation which he determines is encouraging aircraft hijacking by acting in a manner inconsistent with the convention for the suppression of unlawful seizure of aircraft. The Secretary of Transportation is authorized to suspend the operating authority of foreign air carriers under certain circumstances. The Act further provides for the death penalty in air piracy cases, increased security measures at U.S. airports, and financing for airport security guards.

Federal Railroad Safety and Hazardous Materials Transportation Amendments (P.L. 93-633, approved January 3, 1975)—Congress authorized a total of $35 million for fiscal year 1975 to carry out the purposes of the Federal Railroad Safety Act of 1970. Under the Act, the Secretary of the Department of Transportation is required to report on Federal railroad safety standards and State railroad programs planned or underway. Increased penalties are provided for common carriers' failure to make accident reports within the time required by law.

An authorization of $3 million was made to enforce provisions of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Control Act of 1970. To insure safe transportation of hazardous materials, the Secretary is authorized to prescribe regulations for the production, maintenance, and repair of specialized containers for such transport, and may prescribe penalties for violations of these regulations.

The Act also increases the civil and criminal penalties for violations of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 regarding the transportation of hazardous materials, and provides for the delegation by the Secretary of enforcement powers regarding transport of hazardous materials to the Federal Railroads Administrator and the Federal Highway Administrator. The Secretary is further required to issue regulations governing the rail transportation of explosives as soon as practicable after enactment of the Act.

Motor Vehicle Defect Remedy Act (P.L. 93-492, approved October 27, 1974)—Since the enactment of the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966, over 36,000,000 motor vehicles have been recalled due to the presence of a safety related defect. The Motor Vehicle Act currently empowers the Secretary of Transportation to declare that a safety related defect exists and requires that a notification be sent to the owners of the defective vehicles. However, repair at no cost is discretionary with the manufacturer. This Motor Vehicle Defect Remedy Act (S. 355) would amend the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966 so as to provide that defects and failures to comply with motor vehicle safety standards shall be remedied without charge to the owner within eight years.

The legislation, S. 355, as enacted, also forbids seatbelt interlock systems and continuous buzzer systems which prevent starting an automobile until the belts are fastened, so that the only device required now to notify a driver that his seat belt is not locked is a dashboard light. While air bags and other passive restraint systems are not specifically prohibited, any requirement by the Department of Transportation will be subject to congressional approval. The Secretary of Transportation must hold public hearings before requiring installation of any new occupant-restraining system. Congress then would have sixty days to disapprove the requirement by a resolution of both Houses. In addition, the Act requires the Department of Transportation to set new standards for school bus safety. A total of $115 million is authorized over two years.

Amtrak Authorization (P.L. 93-496, approved October 28, 1974)—Both Houses of Congress overwhelmingly approved H.R. 15427, the largest authorization yet for the three-year-old quasi-public corporation created by Congress in 1970 to revitalize the Nation's intercity rail passenger service. Although Congress intended the National Rail Passenger Corporation (Amtrak) to be a profit-making agency, increased costs and deteriorating equipment have necessitated continual congressional appropriations. The assistance under the proposed Act would provide $200 million in fiscal 1975, and increase Amtrak's guaranteed loan authority to $900 million.

Amtrak Improvement Act (P.L. 93-146, approved November 3, 1973)—Amid controversy over operation of the National Railroad Passenger Corporation (Amtrak), the Congress voted to give increased authority to the Corporation to manage the Nation's passenger rail system while seeking to strengthen Amtrak's bargaining position with the railroads which operate passenger trains. The measure also limits executive branch control over the corporation's budget. Congress approved an authorization of $154.3 million in fiscal 1974 for Amtrak, and agreed to a loan guarantee authority increase to $500 million from $200 million. Amtrak is required to continue operating service along its basic route system through fiscal 1974.

Airport Development Acceleration Act (P.L. 93-44, approved June 18, 1973)—In 1973 Congress increased the annual authorization level for airport development grants from $280 million to $310 million and raised from 50 to 75 percent the Federal share of construction costs, except at the largest airports in the country. The bill bans the use of airline passenger fees (head taxes) collected previously at 44 of the Nation's airports, and increases the Federal share for airport safety and security equipment assistance to 82 percent from 50 percent. A similar measure was pocket vetoed in 1972. The development grants in the measure would come from the Airport and Airway Trust Fund and therefore would not drain the general tax revenues.

Regional Railroad Reorganization (P.L. 93-236, approved January 2, 1973)—With six of our Nation's railroads in the Northeast bankrupt, Congress approved legislation establishing a new railroad corporation to replace the region's six companies. To do so, Congress authorized funds to design the new system from existing lines of the six companies. The Act provides that a new profit corporation with federally guaranteed loans will buy out the creditors of the companies, repair tracks and operate the system. A new government agency will supply the loan guarantees to both the new corporation and to non-bankrupt railroads in that region. Funds are also authorized for labor settlements which guarantee existing salary levels for every railroad employee.

Hazardous Materials Transport (P.L. 93-90, approved August 14, 1973)—Congress for the first time in P.L. 93-90 earmarked funds authorized to enforce rail safety regulations for the hazardous materials control program authorized in the Railroad Safety Act of 1970. In addition, Congress authorized the Federal Railroad Administration to add 95 new employees to enforce Federal railroad safety laws and regulations and required the Secretary of Transportation to submit to Congress a report evaluating the hazardous materials control program and offering suggestions for alternative routes to avoid transporting hazardous materials through densely populated areas of the country.

International Air Transportation Fair Competitive Practices Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-579, approved December 31, 1974)—Since October of 1973 U.S. air carriers have experienced ever increasing financial problems in their overseas operations. Although the cause of these problems seemingly stem from the threefold increases in the cost of jet fuel since late 1973 there are a number of other reasons for the economic crisis currently facing international carriers.

The purpose of the International Air Transportation Fair Competitive Practices Act of 1974 passed by the 93rd Congress is to deal directly with the major problems (other than fuel costs) that U.S. air carriers operating in foreign countries are encountering in their competition with foreign carriers. With the enactment of this legislation the Secretary of State becomes responsible for negotiating reduced charges for the use of foreign airport property or airway property in those cases where the Secretary of Transportation determines the initial charges for such services are excessive. The Civil Aeronautics Board is required to act expeditiously on any proposed changes in rates for the aircraft transportation of mail to and from foreign countries. Henceforth, Government financed passengers and property must be transported on U.S. carriers in travel to and from the U.S. The Act precludes any ticket agent from charging or collecting a compensation for air transportation which is different than the currently effective tariff for such transportation.

International Travel Act Appropriation (P.L. 93-193, approved December 19, 1973)—In 1961 Congress authorized a Federal program within the Department of Commerce specifically designed to encourage foreign travelers to visit the United States. The initial appropriation for the United States Travel Service was $3 million. From 1963 through 1970 the authorization level of the Travel Service was maintained at $4.7 million a year. In the 1970 amendments to the International Travel Act, the Travel Service received an increased authorization of $15 million for fiscal years 1971, 1972, and 1973.

The legislation approved by the 93rd Congress provides an appropriation not to exceed (1) $15,000,000 for fiscal year 1974, (2) $20,000,000 for fiscal year 1975, and (3) $25,000,000 for fiscal year 1976. The International Travel Act signed by President Nixon on December 19, 1973 amends the initial Act of 1961 to provide for the consolidation of and authority over both the international and domestic travel (previously administered by the National Park Service) in the Department of Commerce.

Federal Mass Transportation Act (H.R. 12859 passed House August 20, 1974)—In the ten years since Congress passed its first major mass transit legislation, the Urban Mass Transit Act of 1964 (P.L. 88-365), there has been a $3 billion total Federal outlay for mass transit. Enactment of the Unified Transportation Assistance Act (Federal Mass Transportation Act) by the 93rd Congress establishes, however, the first comprehensive, multi-billion-dollar mass transit program and provides Federal grants for day-to-day operating subsidies as well as for construction and maintenance facilities.

The $11.4 billion in appropriations for mass transit capital grants and subsidies within the act are divided among four categories. Of the four categories in the bill, Category A receives over half the mass transit grants authorized in the legislation. Category A includes six cities with existing "fixed rail" transit systems—Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, New York, Philadelphia and San Francisco—and three other cities that have such systems under construction—Atlanta, Baltimore, and Pittsburgh. These nine cities would receive $5.9 billion, of the $11.4 billion authorized for mass transit grants 1975-1980. The second two Categories B and C were designated as "urban areas" of the country with populations of 50,000 or more. The $1.7 billion in Category B funds are to be distributed to these cities by the Secretary of Transportation according to population. Category C funds—$2.9 billion—are to be made available for capital construction grants in Category B cities. The last Category D provides $874 million for grants to cities with populations under 50,000 and rural areas.

Corporation for Public Broadcasting Authorizations (P.L. 93-84, approved August 6, 1973)—Both Houses approved amendments to the Communications Act of 1934 by extending certain appropriations for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting and providing for a two-year funding extension designed to give educational and public broadcasting media an opportunity for realistic planning to implement those public service goals which are at the heart of public broadcasting: diversity, localism, and quality programming in the public interest. A total of $80 million was authorized for fiscal year 1974, and a total of $95 million for fiscal year 1975. Included are authorizations for matching-facilities construction grants for non-commercial educational television and radio broadcasting, as well as grants for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting pursuant to the purposes of the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967. As amended and passed, it represents a compromise and a commitment—a compromise between the need for broadcast stations to be free of Federal coercion and the right of congressional control of Federal funds, and a commitment by the Congress to assure the independent growth and vitality of public broadcasting.

Professional Sports-TV Blackouts (P.L. 93-107, approved September 14, 1973)—This Act amends the Communications Act of 1934 to provide that if any game of a professional sports club is to be televised pursuant to a league television contract and all tickets for seats made available 120 hours (5 days) or more before the scheduled beginning time of the game have been purchased 72 hours (3 days) or more before such time, no agreement preventing the televising of such game at the same time and in the area in which the game is being played would be valid. The person or persons having the rights to telecast the game locally would be required to make those rights available to a television broadcast licensee on reasonable terms and conditions.

Broadcast License Renewal Act—(H.R. 12993 passed the House May 1, 1974)—The House moved to stabilize the broadcast industry's licensing procedures and to clarify the criteria upon which a licensee is judged by passing the Broadcast License Renewal Act. The bill establishes a 4-year term for broadcast licenses rather than the 3-year term that has been in existence since 1927. The bill also provides that the FCC may not, in a proceeding for the renewal of a broadcast license, consider the ownership interests or official connections of the renewal applicant in other stations, other communications media or other businesses, or consider the participation or ownership in the management of the station unless the FCC has adopted rules thereon and given the renewal applicant a reasonable opportunity to conform to those rules.

Section 5 of the bill provides that appeals from decisions and orders of the FCC relating to broadcast authorization must be taken to U.S. Court of Appeals for the circuit in which the broadcast station is located. At present such appeals must be taken to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. Also, the measure requires the FCC to prescribe and abide by time limits for filing petitions to deny broadcast authorizations; it is the intent of the House that any party in interest have a reasonable opportunity to file a petition to deny against an application, but that dilatory devices such as filings out of time which have the effect of delaying proceedings be prevented. Section 4 of the bill would require the Commission to prescribe procedures to encourage licensees and persons raising significant issues regarding the licensees' broadcast operations to conduct negotiations to resolve such issues. Compliance with issues would be voluntary. Also, under section 6(a), the FCC is required to carry out a continuing study to determine how it can eliminate regulations applicable to broadcast licensees which are required by the Communications Act but which do not serve the public interest.

VETERANS

Veterans' Health Care Extension Act (P.L. 93-82, approved August 2, 1973)—Despite a presidential veto in 1972 of similar legislation, Congress quickly approved comprehensive veterans' health care legislation, a significant step forward on behalf of the health care of all veterans. The Act extends outpatient care privileges to veterans currently eligible for hospital care, to peacetime veterans and to those 80 percent or more disabled because of a service-related cause. It also extends VA medical care to certain dependents and survivors of veterans. In addition, Congress directed the VA to develop a health manpower training program and to study the staffing needs of VA hospitals; to set up a VA program for treatment of sickle cell anemia; to require the VA to staff and maintain enough hospital beds to admit all eligible veterans in need of care and to double the number of VA nursing home beds to 8,000.

Veterans' Disability Benefits Increase (P.L. 93-117, approved December 6, 1973)—Concern over the effects of domestic inflation on veterans' pensions prompted Congress to approve an increase in the monthly payments to single and married veterans. The approximate ten percent increase would also raise the pensions received by widows and children of deceased veterans, surviving parents of veterans, and veterans under hospital care.

Veterans' National Cemetery Act (P.L. 93-43, approved June 18, 1973)—After a presidential veto of similar legislation in the 92nd Congress, a second effort proved successful. In enacting P.L. 93-43 Congress increased veteran funeral and burial allowances and established a national cemetery system to be administered by the Veterans Administration. A special plot allowance of $150—in addition to the existing VA allowance for burial and funeral expenses of $250—for veterans not buried in a national or other Federal cemetery was authorized, with additional benefits of up to $800 provided for veterans who die of service-connected disabilities. Finally, the Act directs the VA to conduct a comprehensive study of the U.S. national cemetery system and burial policy.

Veterans' Education and Rehabilitation Amendments (P.L. 93-508, effective December 3, 1974. Both Houses voted to override a Presidential veto December 3, 1974)—Congress overrode President Ford's veto of November 26, 1974 of legislation to increase educational benefits for veterans of the Korean war and the Vietnam era by 22.7 percent, retroactive to September 1, 1974. The increase will be reflected in increases in monthly educational allowances for approximately two million veterans, in addition to dependents and survivors of veterans.

For an unmarried veteran attending college on the GI Bill, the Act means an increase in benefits from the present $220 a month to $270. For a married veteran with one child the monthly benefit will increase from $298 to $366 for each month the child is attending school. Entitlement for GI Bill benefits for undergraduates is extended by the Act to 45 months.

In addition, the Act provides for direct loans of low-interest loans of $600 a year for student veterans and extends vocational rehabilitation programs for disabled veterans, increasing by 18.2 percent benefits for veterans in rehabilitation or job training programs.

Veterans' Housing Act (P.L. 93-569, approved December 31, 1974)—As a result of hearings held on GI housing problems, Congress passed legislation to improve the basic provisions of the veterans' home loan programs. Under the bill, the maximum amount of a loan guaranty increases from $12,500 to $15,000, and the Administrator of the Veterans' Administration is allowed to grant authority to process GI home loans on an automatic guaranty basis. In addition, H.R. 15912 improves provisions for mobile home purchases by increasing the maximum guarantee from 30 to 50 per cent. To meet the specific housing needs of disabled veterans, the maxinum grant for specially adapted housing is increased to $20,000.

Military Dependents Assistance Act Amendments (P.L. 93-64, approved July 9, 1973)—The Act is amended to make permanent certain provisions relating to the definition of dependents of veterans. Formerly Section 401 of title 37, U.S. Code contained the word "legitimate" in the definition of child as a dependent. That definition is expanded to cover a child who is illegitimate and whose alleged member-father has been judicially decreed to be the father of the child, or judicially ordered to contribute to the child's support, or whose parentage has been admitted in writing by the member. Section 401(a) of that title is also amended to eliminate the requirement that the dependent parent reside in the member's household. The dependency of the parent is now determined on the basis of an affidavit submitted by the parent, along with any other evidence required under the regulations prescribed by the Secretary concerned. Those sections of title 37 relating to quartering allowances were amended to provide different rates for certain ranks.

The miscellaneous provisions of P.L. 93-64 extended, for two years, until June 30, 1975, the payment of a bonus of up to $3,000 for an initial enlistment or an extension of an initial period of active duty. The Act limits the career fields eligible for the bonus so as to insure that only individuals who enlist in skills in the infantry, armor, and artillery would be eligible for such a bonus.

Veterans' Administration, Flexibility in Loans (P.L. 93-75, approved July 26, 1973)—The purpose of this legislation was passed by Congress eliminates the existing statutory requirement of title 38, United States Code, that the interest rate on Veterans' Administration loans should not exceed the rate in effect under the National Housing Act. The effect of this amendment is to give the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs independent authority to adjust the rate of interest on guaranteed loans commensurate with changing loan market demands. This flexible authority to adjust home loan interest rates will prevent a substantial cutback in available funds for VA home loans.

Veterans' Disability Compensation and Survivor Benefits Act of 1974—(P.L. 93-295, approved May 31, 1974)—Congress approved a $566.8 million cost-of-living increase in benefits to the Nation's 2.2 million veterans with service-connected disabilities and to their dependents and survivors. The Act provides for a 15 percent increase in benefits to veterans who are 10 to 50 percent disabled, and 18 percent to veterans whose disability is 50 percent or more. In addition, it provides a 15 percent raise in benefits to dependents of veterans who are 50 percent or more disabled, and a 17 percent cost-of-living increase for widows and other dependent survivors.

Other provisions of the Act: 1) Equalize the payments to widows and survivors of veterans of peacetime and wartime service where death occurred prior to January 1, 1957 (Previously, survivors of veterans who served during "peacetime" periods were entitled to death compensation at the rate of only 80 percent of that received by survivors of veterans who served during a "war-time" period); 2) Authorize a study by the Veterans Administration of applications for dependency and indemnity compensation by widows of veterans who had a disability total and permanent at the time of death; and 3) Authorize the Administrator to pay beneficiaries directly when he determines it is in the interest of the beneficiary, regardless of legal disability of the beneficiary or the appointment of a fiduciary.

Servicemen's Group Life Insurance Coverage Extension (P.L. 93-289, approved May 24, 1974)—As an added incentive for persons to join and remain in our standby military forces, Congress enacted legislation which for the first time provides full coverage under Servicemen's Group Life Insurance (SGLI) for certain members of the Reserves and National Guard. Members of the Ready Reserves presently granted full time coverage under the Act have until now only been covered during limited duty periods and travel time to and from such duties. Members of the Retired Reserve granted full coverage under the Act were previously not eligible for SGLI. The Act further authorizes the conversion of such insurance to five year term, low-cost Veterans Group Life Insurance, and authorizes allotments from the pay of members of the National Guard of the United States for group life insurance premiums.

Medical Care for Certain Members of Allied Wartime Forces (H.R. 18377 passed the House August 5, 1974)—The House passed legislation to amend title 38, United States Code, to provide hospital and medical care to veterans of Poland and Czechoslovakia who served in combat during World Wars I and II against enemies of the United States. The veterans would have to show that they have been U.S. citizens for at least 10 years and as a prerequisite to entitlement to medical care produce a certification from either the British War Office or the French Ministry of Defense as evidence of subsequent service in the French or British armed forces during the war concerned. Under existing law, the Veterans' Administration is authorized to grant such benefits to discharged members of the Armed Forces of nations allied with the U.S. during the world wars. However, this is only in consideration of reciprocal services extended to U.S. veterans, and due to the change of governments in Poland and Czechoslovakia, recourse to the reciprocal services authority is not available.

Veterans' Adaptive Auto Equipment (P.L. 93-538, approved December 22, 1974)—This legislation amends title 38 of the United States Code relating to the provision of adaptive equipment for automobiles used by disabled veterans and servicemen. As amended, the law requires the Administrator of the Veterans' Administration to provide and repair adaptive equipment for any automobile or other vehicle which an eligible person may previously or subsequently have acquired.

Tax Treatment for Prisoners of War (H.R. 8214 passed the House August 3, 1973)—To assist our prisoners of war and the families of those missing in action, the House amended present law to provide certain relief for military and civilian personnel returning from the Vietnam conflict and the families of those individuals who are listed as missing in action and are subsequently determined to have died at an earlier time.

First, the bill extends the provision under present law which permits military personnel who are hospitalized as a result of service in a combat zone to exclude military pay they receive during the period of hospitalization to cover for a period of time the pay they receive while hospitalized after all combatant activities have terminated. Since the exclusion under present law only applies during the period in which they are in combatant activities in a combat zone, the bill extends this exclusion for a period of time to cover a member of the Armed Forces who was hospitalized for an injury incurred in a combat zone in the waning days of the Vietnam War.

Second, the bill extends the provision which forgives another provision, in the case of a member of the Armed Forces who dies while serving in a combat zone to cover the period he is in a missing status even though it is subsequently determined that he actually died at an earlier time. The House felt it appropriate to prevent any additional hardship to his family which could result from the collection of taxes for years following his actual death, and therefore extends this forgiveness to cover the years a serviceman is in missing status until his status is changed. The measure provides that the widow be eligible for surviving spouse tax treatment for the two years following the year in which her husband's missing status is changed rather than the two years following the year of actual death.

WOMEN'S RIGHTS AND CIVIL LIBERTIES

Privacy Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-579, approved by the President December 31, 1974)—Disturbed by documented reports about the misuse of Federal records, both Houses of Congress approved overwhelmingly the Privacy Act of 1974. The President signed the measure on January 1, 1975, marking the first major privacy legislation since acceptance of the Bill of Rights in the eighteenth century. A number of significant subjects are covered but the most important provision may be the establishment of the Privacy Protection Study Commission with responsibilities for exploring areas concerned with individual privacy, whether in the private or governmental sectors. In addition, the Commission may provide technical assistance, on request, for preparing model state privacy legislation.

The Act gives a right of access to records maintained by any Federal agency as well as the right to require correction of incomplete or erroneous information. Agencies are required to maintain an accounting of all record disclosures for five years or the life of the disclosure, whichever is longer.

A moratorium is placed on the use of the social security number by prohibiting state and local governments from conditioning a right, benefit, or privilege upon an individual's disclosure of his number. In addition, a provision in the Act requires that an individual being asked for his account number must also be given notice of the nature, authority, and purpose of the request. The growing use of the number as a universal identifier has increasingly been regarded as dehumanizing and threatening to the freedom and privacy of citizens. Thus this clause alone provides substantial protection to a right of privacy.

Under the Act, notice of all proposals to establish or change a system of records must be sent to Congress and to the Office of Management and Budget for assessment of the privacy impact of the proposal. Proposals must also consider the potential repercussions which the new data-collection system may have on federal relations and on separation of powers. The thrust of this requirement is to restrain agencies from creating a national data bank which would store all information about an individual in a single location.

Of particular annoyance to citizens has been the sale or rental of mailing lists by government agencies to commercial concerns. The Act deals with this problem by prohibiting such sale or rental by an agency and a person may also request to have his name removed from such lists.

After years of study by several committees of Congress on the many facets of privacy, the current legislation appears to have resolved several of the more glaring threats and to have set the stage for dealing with more difficult issues.

Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act of 1974 (P.L. 380, approved August 21, 1974)—Catalyzed by numerous reports about the abuse of personal data by schools and Government agencies, Congress amended the Education and Secondary Education Act to deny Federal funds to any educational institution which prevented parental access to a child's school records or permitted the release of the records except to personnel specifically authorized to receive them. In addition, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare is required to develop and adopt regulations controlling the use, dissemination, and protection of data about individual students.

If implementation is successful, the privacy concept embedded in this Act may well become the prototype for similar provisions in other types of welfare legislation. Congress will thus have taken a significant and dramatic step toward ensuring the dignity of the individual in a time when government is rapidly increasing its data-gathering activities about its citizens.

Protection of the Rights and Privacy of Parents and Students (P.L. 93-568, approved December 31, 1974)—This Act amends the language of the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-380) by maintaining the confidential nature of certain materials which may be in a student's school file. These include the financial records of the parents, letters of recommendation that were placed in the files prior to January 1, 1975, and allows the student to sign a waiver of his right of access to his file.

The Act further requires that no funds be allocated to any educational institution unless the parents of students at the institution have the opportunity to challenge the content of the student's education records for purposes of correcting inaccurate data or deleting inappropriate data. However, a student's records may be released to appropriate school officials, to certain educational research organizations, and to auditors or evaluators of Federally supported education programs. In addition, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare is required to adopt regulations to protect the rights of privacy of students and their families in connection with data-gathering activities conducted by an education agency.

Commission for the Review of Federal and State Laws Relating to Wiretapping and Electronic Surveillance (P.L. 93-609, approved January 2, 1975)—Congress acted affirmatively to safeguard the rights of privacy of the individual by extending the authority for one year of the National Commission for the Review of Federal and State Laws on Wiretapping and Electronic Surveillance. In addition to extending the Commission's life, this measure exempts the Commission from the Federal Advisory Committee Act thus allowing it to hold closed-door meetings with majority vote. The Committee will therefore be able to examine the transcripts and logs of wiretaps while maintaining the privacy of those whose conversations have been recorded. Confidentiality of national security wiretaps will also be maintained by this action. The bill allows the Commission to review and listen to tapes produced by illegal wiretaps. Title 18, U.S.C. 2515 presently prohibits any agency of the Government from receiving in evidence material obtained from an illegal wiretap. The purpose of this prohibition is to prevent the substance of such evidence being used against the subject of the wiretap. However, the Commission's interest does not lie in obtaining information regarding the subject of an illegal wiretap, but in examining the nature of the law itself. It was the intent of the House that the Commission be authorized to review such material if it is to adequately study the abuses of wiretapping and electronic surveillance. Finally, the bill restates the legislative intent expressed in the Omnibus Crime Control Act of 1970 which revived the Commission.

Equal Credit Opportunity Act (P.L. 93-495, approved October 28, 1974)—One of the major women's rights issues to receive legislative attention by the 93rd Congress was that of sex discrimination in credit transactions. Hearings before the National Commission on Consumer Finance in 1972 revealed that it was often more difficult for a woman than for a man of equal creditworthiness to obtain credit. In particular, testimony indicated that single women had more trouble obtaining credit than single men, especially mortgage credit; creditors generally required a woman who already had credit to reapply for credit when she married, although similar reapplication was not required for men when they married; creditors were often unwilling to extend credit to a married woman in her own name; women who are divorced or widowed had trouble reestablishing credit; and creditors were often unwilling to count the wife's income when a married couple applied for credit. The Equal Credit Opportunity Act was passed as an amendment to the Depository Institutions Act of 1974, and amends the Consumer Credit Protection Act to forbid discrimination based on sex or marital status in all aspects of credit transactions. Passage of this legislation is a significant step forward in the effort to assure full economic rights to women.

Rape Prevention and Control (H.R. 14214 pocket vetoed by the President December 22, 1974)—The 93rd Congress passed the Health Revenue Sharing and Health Services Act of 1974, including provisions which would have required the establishment of an administrative unit within the Department of Health, Education and Welfare for rape prevention and control programs. The incidence of forcible rape had risen 70 percent between 1967 and 1972, and this increase in incidence of the crime as well as the influence of the feminist movement had resulted in a heightened public awareness of the problems of rape prevention and criminal prosecution.

Extension of Minimum Wage Coverage to Domestic Workers (P.L. 93-259, approved April 8, 1974)—This Congress amended the Fair Labor Standards Act to increase the minimum wage, extending its coverage to seven million workers, including state, county and municipal employees and domestic workers, most of whom are women. The minimum wage and overtime coverage now apply to domestic workers who earn more than $50.00 in a calendar quarter, or who work more than eight hours a week for one or more employers.

Uniform Age Qualifications for Men and Women Enlisting in the Armed Services (P.L. 93-290, approved May 24, 1974)—The House had acted last December 17, 1973, to approve this measure, which establishes the same minimum age qualifications for both males and females who wish to enlist in the armed services. The bill was approved by the Senate during the second session and signed into law.

Women's Educational Equity Act (P.L. 93-380, approved August 21, 1974)—Among the provisions of the Education Amendments Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-380), which was enacted during the second session, are those of the "Women's Educational Equity Act," contained in Section 408, the purpose of which is to provide educational equity for women in the United States. This section establishes, in the Office of Education, an Advisory Council on Women's Educational Programs to advise on policy matters related to women's educational equity; make recommendations; develop criteria for the establishment of program priorities; and review the results of a national, comprehensive study of sex discrimination in education, which the Commissioner of Education is authorized and directed to conduct. It authorizes the Commissioner to make grants and enter into contracts in order to support activities designed to insure educational equity for women. These projects are to deal with issues such as the development of non-sexist curricula; training for educational personnel; guidance and counseling activities; continuing education programs for adults; and the expansion and improvement of educational programs for women in vocational education, career education, physical education, and educational administration—all toward the end of achieving educational equity in this country. The Commissioner is authorized to spend up to $30 million annually in this effort for fiscal years 1976 and 1977.

Prohibition of Sex Discrimination in Housing (P.L. 93-385, approved August 22, 1974)—Housing and Community Development Act of 1974 includes provisions which relate to sex discrimination in housing. Retained from the House bill were provisions prohibiting discrimination on the basis of race, color, national origin, or sex in carrying out community development programs; and providing for a procedure to terminate or reduce grant payments in the case of noncompliance (Sec. 109). House provisions were also retained which amend the National Housing Act to prohibit discrimination based on sex in federally-related mortgage loans, insurance, guarantee, or related assistance; and require lenders to consider the combined incomes of husbands and wives in extending mortgage credit (Sec. 808). Other provisions amend the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sex in the financing, sale, or rental of housing or the provision of brokerage services.

Women's Equality Day (P.L. 93-382, approved August 22, 1974)—Once again this year, the Congress recognized the importance of the anniversary of women's suffrage and passed a bill to authorize and request the President to designate August 26, 1974, to be "Women's Equality Day."

Equal Spouse Benefits for Male and Female Federal Employees (P.L. 93-416, approved September 7, 1974)—During the second session of the 93rd Congress, continued efforts were made to provide equality of treatment of male and female employees of the Federal Government. Provisions of the Federal Employee's Compensation Act provide equality of treatment for federal employees, regardless of sex, in terms of benefits to spouses in cases of death or work injury.

Elimination of Sex Discrimination in Programs of the Naval Sea Cadets Corps (P.L. 93-504, approved November 29, 1974)—In order to offer girls as well as boys an opportunity to participate in the programs of the Naval Sea Cadets, the 93rd Congress enacted legislation to amend the act to incorporate the Naval Sea Cadets Corps in order to eliminate sex discrimination in its programs.

Elimination of Sex Discrimination in Little League Baseball (P.L. 93-551, approved December 26, 1974)—The 93rd Congress, in an effort to open the youth programs of Little League Baseball, Inc., to girls, passed a bill to amend the act to incorporate that organization in order to eliminate discrimination based on sex. The Act provides girls as well as boys the opportunity to try out for positions on Little League baseball teams.

OTHER

Bicentennial Administration (P.L. 93-179, approved December 11, 1973)—In an effort to better coordinate the activities of State, local and private groups in preparation for the American bicentennial, Congress changed the American Bicentennial Commission to the American Bicentennial Administration. The new Administration will have an eleven member advisory board and a 25 member policy council to replace the Commission's 50 member board, with Senate confirmation of a presidentially appointed administrator. The board is to elect a director from its membership. The Act provides a $20 million matching grant program that would allocate approximately $200,000 to States and territories for bicentennial activities, and authorizes $410 million annually for administration of the programs. By this action Congress can be better assured that our 200th birthday as a Nation will be appropriately celebrated.

Authorizations for Cabinet Committee on Opportunities for Spanish-Speaking People (H.R. 10397 passed the House October 18, 1973)—In the Second Session, Congress extended the authorizations of appropriations for the Cabinet Committee on Opportunities for Spanish-Speaking People through December 30, 1974. The Act provides a ceiling of $1.5 million in appropriations with $750,000 of this amount to be available in fiscal year 1975. The Committee, which was established during the 91st Congress for a period of five years, is to aid Spanish-speaking and Spanish-surnamed Americans in coping with problems relating to housing, employment, education, and health care, as well as to insure that Federal programs are responsive to their needs. This Act not only extends funding for the remaining one and one-half years of its tenure, but also requires that regional offices be established and assigns the Cabinet Committee the added function of assisting Spanish-speaking groups and individuals in securing their participation in various benefits and assistance programs.

Weather Modification Activity Authorization (P.L. 93-436, approved October 5, 1974)—Recognizing the continuing need for detailed knowledge and record-keeping of attempts to modify weather patterns in the United States, the Congress passed legislation which provides for the reporting of all such activities to the Federal government for an additional three years, or through Fiscal Year 1977. The Act extends the provisions of P.L. 92-205, by authorizing $200,000 for this purpose. The reporting and record-keeping of weather modification activities throughout the United States is under the jurisdiction and control of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA), under the Department of Commerce.

Weather modification activities in the U.S. include projects to increase precipitation for purposes of irrigation, power generation, and other water use; to decrease hail in order to lessen crop damage; and to achieve fog dispersal at airports in order to insure maximum utilization of air transport. Since weather control is not an exact science, it is necessary to have complete data on weather modification operations. NOAA provides the only source of factual and complete information on such activities—both federal and nonfederal—and the reported information is available to the public as well as to all Federal agencies. One of the most important aspects of maintaining detailed records of weather modification activities is to insure that duplicative operations do not take place, and that concurrent operations do not interfere with each other.

Hobby Protection Act (P.L. 93-167, approved November 29, 1973)—This legislation is designed to offer protection to millions of American hobbyists from imitation items purported to be authentic. The Act specifically applies to imitation political and numismatic items. Imitation political items, manufactured domestically or imported into the U.S., must be permanently marked with the year of manufacture. Imitation numismatic items, again of domestic or foreign origin, must be marked "copy." The Act's provisions do not supersede any State statutes, but act in addition to other Federal or State law.

Postal Service Annual Authorizations (H.R. 2990 passed the House July 12, 1973)—As passed, the bill requires annual authoriza-tions for appropriations to the Postal Service for revenue foregone and public service costs. The Postal Reorganization Act of 1970 contained one permanent appropriation for all postal revenues and three permanent authorizations for appropriations for public service costs, revenue foregone and transitional costs. Public service costs are incurred by the Postal Service in providing a maximum degree of effective and regular postal service nationwide and in communities where post offices may not be deemed self-sustaining. Revenue foregone is that revenue lost by reason of carrying the mails free or at reduced rates of postage as required by specific provisions of law. The bill requires the Postal Service to secure annual authorizations for these two significant appropriations it must receive from the Federal Treasury in order to bridge the gap between total postal revenues and total postal costs. It would not affect the other permanent appropriations authorizations. The bill also requires that the Postal Service keep the appropriate committees of Congress fully informed as to its activities and requires any Federal agency to furnish requested information to such committees relating to the Postal Service.

VETOES IN THE FIRST SESSION, 93D CONGRESS

Vocational Rehabilitation (S. 7 vetoed by the President March 27, 1973)—Both Houses gave final approval to the Vocational Rehabilitation Act of 1973 which would have extended the appropriations authority for programs for fiscal 1973, 1974 and for some programs for 1975. The total expenditures for the three years would have been $2.6 billion. Seven new categorical grant programs would have been established.

Rural Water and Sewer Grants (H.R. 3298 vetoed by the President April 5, 1973)—This legislation would have restored the rural water and sewer grant program, discontinued by the Administration on January 10, 1973, under the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act.

Confirmation of Director and Deputy Director of the Office of Management and Budget (S. 518 vetoed by the President May 18, 1973)—This bill would have abolished the offices of Director and Deputy Director of the Office of Management and Budget and then recreated these offices, making them subject to Senate confirmation.

Second Supplemental Appropriations Act of 1973 (H.R. 7447 vetoed by the President June 27, 1973)—Both Houses approved in a fiscal 1973 supplementary appropriation of $3,362,845,279, an amendment prohibiting immediately funds in the bill and in previously enacted legislation from being used to support U.S. combat activities in or over Cambodia or Laos. It was the first time since the United States became involved in the Indochina War that both chambers had approved a bombing restriction provision.

Emergency Medical Services Systems Act of 1973 (S. 504 vetoed by the President August 1, 1973)—This vetoed bill would have authorized the expenditure of $185 million over the next three fiscal years to help State and local jurisdictions establish emergency medical systems. Funds would have been used for training of ambulance attendants and other emergency personnel, improved transportation for emergency victims, expansion and upgrading of emergency rooms. The closing of eight PHS hospitals, previously announced by the Administration, would have been prohibited, because HEW failed to show that patients would receive equal or better medical care at other facilities.

Minimum Wage Act (H.R. 7935 vetoed by the President September 6, 1973)—H.R. 7935 would have required wage increases for four million of the nation's worst paid workers—some five percent of the work force—and would have extended minimum wage coverage to seven million additional employees, including domestic employees, government employees, certain employees of conglomerates, retail and service employees of chain stores, and others. The vetoed bill would have raised the minimum wage from its present level of $1.60 an hour to $2 on November 1, 1973 and to $2.20 by July 1, 1974 for workers covered before 1966; non-farm workers covered after 1966 would have risen in four steps to $2.20 by July 1, 1976; farm workers would have risen in four steps to $2.20 by July 1, 1976. The bill would have covered 935,000 domestic workers for the first time with a $1.80 minimum in November and $2.20 by July 1975. A major point of contention was the subminimum wage for youth, which the Administration strongly backed for broad categories of young workers. The Congress rejected this in favor of a limited subminimum for full-time students working in certain occupations.

Disaster Loan Act (S. 1672 vetoed by the President September 22, 1973)—This bill would have provided an amendment to the Small Business Act which would have increased the authority of the Small Business Administration to provide loans to small firms in the event of natural disasters.

Small Business Amendments (S. 1672 vetoed by the President September 24, 1973)—Congress amended the Small Business Act to increase to $6.6 billion from the existing $4.3 billion ceiling the authority of the Small Business Administration to provide loans to small firms in the event of natural disasters. Effective April 20, 1973 to July 1, 1975, disaster relief loans would have been available to victims of disasters from the Small Business Administration and the Farmers Home Administration. The proposed Act would have authorized a uniform program of disaster loans at three percent with $2,500 forgiveness, or one percent of the total amount and would have prohibited sex discrimination by the Small Business Administration. Special consideration would have been given to veterans and survivors.

USIA Authorizations (S. 1317 vetoed by the President October 23, 1973) Congress authorized $216,775,000 for the U.S. Information Agency for fiscal 1974 in a bill vetoed by the President because of an amendment claimed to be an unconstitutional encroachment of executive authority. The provision would have required a cutoff of funds for the USIA if the Agency failed to respond within 35 days to a written request of either the House Foreign Affairs or the Senate Foreign Relations Committees for documents or other information relating to the Agency. Subsequently, Congress approved USIA authorization of $215,614,000 for fiscal 1974 and barred the use of any appropriation for programs that had not been authorized or any appropriation that was above the amount authorized for fiscal 1974, excluding continued funding resolutions.

War Powers Resolution (H.J. Res. 542 vetoed by the President October 24, 1973. Attempts to override succeeded in the House (November 7, 1973) and in the Senate (November 7, 1973). H.J. Res. 542 became Public Law 93-148 without the President's signature)—Congress reasserted its constitutional role in the war-making area by placing restraints on the authority of the President to commit U.S. forces to hostilities without congressional consent. Both Houses gave final approval to the War Powers Resolution, which requires consultation with Congress if at all possible in advance of any introduction of U.S. forces to hostilities, and a full report to Congress within 48 hours after taking such action. If Congress does not expressly authorize the commitment, the President must withdraw troops within 60 days (a 30 day extension is permitted if the safety of troops so requires). Anytime after the commitment of forces, the Congress could mandate immediate withdrawal through passage of a concurrent resolution—which is not subject to veto. In addition, the resolution stipulates that none of its provisions are to be construed as granting any authority to the President that he would not have had in the absence of the resolution. The power of the President to commit forces is defined to include only situations where Congress has declared war or provided other statutory authorization, or when a national emergency exists because of attack on the U.S. or its forces.

Mass Transit Act Amendments (H.R. 10511 pocket vetoed by the President January 3, 1974)—This bill would have amended the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964 to provide that Urban Mass Transportation Administration money could be used for the purchase of buses by public transportation agencies and that such equipment could be used for charter services.

VETOES IN SECOND SESSION, 93D CONGRESS (AS OF JANUARY 7, 1974)

Emergency Energy Act (S. 2589 vetoed by the President March 5, 1974)—This bill gave the President authority to ration gasoline, order energy conservation measures, and to modify environmental standards if such action was necessary to conserve oil. Among the additional provisions of the legislation were those which would give Congress a veto power over presidential energy conservation measures, make available to homeowners low interest loans for installing storm windows and more efficient heating units, and the establishment of a ceiling on the price of domestically produced crude oil. Attempt to override the veto in the Senate failed, 3/6/74, by a vote of 58-40.

Department of Agriculture, Environmental Protection Agency and Certain Related Agencies Appropriations, Fiscal Year 1975 (H.R. 15472 vetoed by the President August 8, 1974)—Congress in July cleared appropriations of $13,571,395,000 for the Agriculture, Environment and Consumer Appropriations. A total of $6,282,815,000 was approved for agricultural programs including research, scientific activities overseas, cooperative state research service, and for the agricultural extension service. The legislation would have limited concessional sales under the Food for Peace program to ten percent per country. For rural development programs, a sum of $831,341,000 was appropriated, while a total of $1,311,191,000 was approved for environmental programs. For consumer protection programs administered by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, General Services Administration, Agricultural Department, Consumer Product Safety Commission, and the Federal Trade Commission a sum of $5,146,048,000 was appropriated. At the Administration's request, both Houses approved $100 million for child nutrition and school lunch funding administered by the Department of Agriculture.

Pay of U.S. Deputy Marshals (H.R. 5094 vetoed by the President August 12, 1974)—This bill required the reclassification and upgrading of deputy United States marshals.

Animal Health Research (H.R. 11873 vetoed by the President August 14, 1974)—Both Houses approved provisions authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to encourage and assist States in carrying out programs of animal health research, and creating a new categorical grant program that would authorize an expenditure of $47 million above funds presently appropriated.

Directing the Secretary of the Interior to Sell Certain Reserve Phosphate Interests (H.R. 10626 vetoed by the President September 30, 1974)—This private bill authorized and directed the Secretary of the Interior to sell to John and Martha Carter all phosphate interests now owned by the United States in the described lands located in Polk County, Florida.

Atomic Energy Act Amendment (H.R. 15323 vetoed by the President October 12, 1974)—This congressional action would have amended the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 to revise the method of providing public remuneration in the event of a nuclear incident. The proposed Act would have broadened the indemnity provisions to include damages resulting from nuclear thefts as well as accidents, and would have provided that the Act become effective thirty days after the date on which the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy submitted to Congress an evaluation of the Reactor Study, entitled "An Assessment of Accident Risks in the U.S. Commercial Nuclear Power Plants." However, the Act provided that its provisions would not take effect if Congress disapproved the extension after the Joint Committee submitted its evaluation.

Railroad Retirement (H.R. 15301 vetoed by the President October 12, 1974. Attempts to override succeeded in the House (October 15, 1974) and in the Senate (October 16, 1974). H.R. 15301 became Public Law 93-445 without the President's signature)—Congress overrode a presidential veto of a measure restructuring the railroad retirement system and authorizing $285 million annually for the next twenty-five years from general treasury funds. The new Act strengthens the retirement system at a time when the railroads have been troubled by finances and a decreased employment. Under its provisions, the Act establishes a pension system, similar to the social security system, but ending the dual benefits system which allows railroad workers to collect social security and railroad retirement benefits. Members of the retirement system, however, who received the dual benefits before December 31, and those with vested rights under each, will continue to be allowed dual benefits.

The Act also will allow the "30 and out" retirement programs—meaning that an employee could retire after 30 years' service regardless of age. Senate voted to override by a vote of 72 to 1 on October 16, 1974. House voted to override by a vote of 360 to 12 on October 15, 1974.

Cut-off of Military Aid to Turkey (H.J. Res. 1131, vetoed by the President October 14, 1974)—The House gave final approval to a continuing appropriations resolution for fiscal year 1975 and added an amendment prohibiting all military aid to Turkey until the President certified that substantial progress had been made in arriving at a negotiated settlement of the Cyprus conflict. On October 9, the Senate gave its approval of the resolution as amended by the House, thus readying the bill for the President. The amendment was a substitute for milder language suggested by a House-Senate conference committee with White House support which would have halted military aid to Turkey unless and until the President determines that the Turkish Government was making good faith efforts to reach a settlement. Supporters of the stricter amendment contended that the use of American weapons by the Turks during the recent Cyprus conflagration was in violation of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Foreign Military Sales Act, which prohibit the use of American weapons for offensive purposes. Furthermore they saw the continued flow of military aid, which is currently provided at an annual rate of $173.7 million a year, as a hindrance to negotiations of the Cyprus situation.

Cut-Off of Military Aid to Turkey (H.J. Res. 1163 vetoed by the President October 17, 1974)—In response to the President's veto of the continuing appropriations resolution with the Turkey aid cutoff, the House and Senate approved on October 16 the same resolution as passed and vetoed earlier (H.J. Res. 1131) with a milder restriction on aid to Turkey. The new restriction provided for a halt to military assistance to Turkey as of December 10, 1974 unless there is substantial progress toward a settlement of the Cyprus question. However, U.S. military aid would be ceased immediately if equipment provided to Turkey is sent to Cyprus. The language in this resolution was intended to be a compromise, by allowing the President and Secretary of State two months in which to seek a settlement in Cyprus or to bring about progress toward that end.

Freedom of Information Act Amendments of 1974 (H.R. 12471 vetoed by the President October 17, 1974. Attempts to override succeeded in the House (November 20, 1974) and in the Senate (November 21, 1974). H.R. 12471 became Public Law 93-502 without the President's signature)—

Congressional action on this legislation represents the first amendments to the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) since its original enactment in 1966. The amendments would have required Federal agencies to adhere to improved administrative procedures designed to enhance responsiveness to FOIA requests. They require agencies to publish and distribute indexes identifying information for the public concerning any agency matter issued or adopted after July 4, 1967. Agencies would have been required to furnish their records to any person who reasonably described and requested such records. Technicalities pertaining to the costs of recovery and duplicating of agency records were also dealt with. Under the provisions of this legislation, the burden of proof would have been on the Government in judicial review to show why requested records should be exempt from mandatory disclosure.

National Wildlife Refuge System Administration Act Amendments (H.R. 11541 vetoed by the President October 24, 1974)—This Act amended section 4(d) of the Act of October 15, 1966, by adding a new standard in determining the authority of the Secretary of the Interior to allow certain rights-of-way across lands of the National Wildlife Refuge System. The new standard would require the Secretary to review all reasonable alternatives to the use of such area, and then make a determination that the proposed right-of-way use is the most feasible and prudent alternative for such purpose.

Relief of Alvin V. Burt, Jr., and the Survivors of Douglas E. Kennedy (H.R. 6624 vetoed by the President October 29, 1974)—This private bill provided for a payment to the above for injuries suffered as a result of wounds inflicted by U.S. Forces in the Dominican Republic in 1965.

Relief of Nolan Sharp (H.R. 7768 vetoed by the President October 29, 1974)—A bill authorizing retroactive service-connected disability payments to Mr. Sharp, because of multiple sclerosis, for the period from January 16, 1956, to October 1, 1962.

Farm Labor Contractor Registration Act Amendments (H.R. 13342 vetoed by the President October 29, 1974)—The intent of the bill was to strengthen protection for migrant farm workers. The objections of the President to this bill were not related to its principal provisions, but rather to a "rider" which would have reclassified hearing officer positions in the Department of Labor, and made existing hearing officers Administrative Law Judges.

Rehabilitation Act and Randolph-Sheppard Act Amendments (H.R. 14225 vetoed by the President October 29, 1974. Attempts to override the veto succeeded in the House

December 20, 1974

(November 20, 1974) and in the Senate (November 21, 1974). A clean bill, H.R. 17503, was passed by both chambers and allowed by the President to become Public Law 93-516.—This Act provided for extending the authorization of appropriations in the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 for 1 year, the transfer of the Rehabilitation Service Administration to the Office of the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, the amendment of the Randolph-Sheppard Act for the Blind, and the convening of a White House Conference on Handicapped Individuals.

Veterans' Educational Benefits Act (H.R. 12628) vetoed by the President November 26, 1974. Override attempt in the Senate succeeded (December 3, 1974). H.R. 12628 became Public Law 93-508.—The Veterans' Educational Benefits Act provided for increased educational benefits for veterans including those who served in the post-Korean War and Vietnam War periods. The bill increased educational allowance by 22.7 percent, boosted on-the-job training funds and vocational aid for the disabled by 18.2 percent, created a new $600 a year educational loan program and extended the existing 36 month entitlement period for veterans working on undergraduate degrees to 45 months.

Zinc Tariff Bill (H.R. 6191) vetoed by the President November 26, 1974.—The bill amended the Tariff Schedules of the United States to provide that certain forms of zinc be admitted free of duty until June 30, 1977. The bill also included tax provisions which allow certain taxpayers who have already deducted their casualty losses from disasters to also exclude from taxable income any amounts received from tort compensation or Federal loan cancellations based on those losses.

Flood Control Act of 1965 Amendments (S. 3537) vetoed by the President December 17, 1974.—Section 204 of the Flood Control Act of 1965 was modified by this bill thereby authorizing a revision of the Willow Creek Dam Project in Oregon. The purpose of the bill was to emphasize flood control and to provide for advance payment of the Federal share of the cost to relocate the water system of the town of Heppner.

Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933 Amendments (H.R. 11929) pocket vetoed by the President December 23, 1974.—Section 15d of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933 was amended by this bill to provide that expenditures for pollution control facilities would be credited against required power investment return payments and repayments.

Health Revenue Sharing and Health Services Act of 1974 (H.R. 14214) pocket vetoed by the President December 23, 1974.—This omnibus bill provided for, among other things: 1) authorization of appropriations for grants to States for family planning service project grants and contracts; 2) expanded the services of Community Mental Health Centers; 3) Migrant Health Centers; 4) changes in grant procedures; 5) new programs for the control of disease borne by rodents; and 6) establishment of temporary commissions and/or programs related to epilepsy, Huntington's disease, hemophilia, and rape prevention and control.

Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1974 (S. 425) pocket vetoed by the President December 30, 1974.—The purpose of S. 425 was to prevent the adverse effects to society and the environment resulting from surface coal mining operations and surface impacts of underground coal mining operations.

Energy Transportation Security Act of 1974 (H.R. 8193) pocket vetoed by the President December 30, 1974.—This bill required that 20 percent of the gross tonnage of all oil transported in bulk on ocean vessels (whether transported directly from the original point of production or indirectly from such point to and from any intermediate points used for storage, refining, processing, packaging, unloading or reloading of oil) for import into the United States shall be transported on privately owned United States flag commercial vessels. This figure would rise to 25 percent after June 30, 1975 and 30 percent after June 30, 1977.

Per Diem and Mileage Expense Bill (S. 3341) pocket vetoed by the President December 31, 1974.—This bill sought to increase various allowances authorized Federal employees while in travel status. Under this act the General Services Administration would be authorized to issue regulations allowing expenditures of government funds for travel up to certain maximums. Among the maximums which could be set would be a per diem rate of $35 as opposed to the current maximum of $25 and a mileage allowance of from $.15 to $.20 a mile for use of privately owned automobiles.

Nurse Training Act of 1974 (H.R. 17085) pocket vetoed by the President January 4, 1975.—This bill amended Title VIII of the Public Health Service Act to revise and extend the programs of assistance for nurse training. Specifically, the bill provided for $25 million for extension of grants and loan guarantees and interest subsidies; an extension and revision of capitation grants; and extension of financial distress grants; grants for special projects; grants for Nurse Practitioner Programs; and various forms of assistance, e.g., traineeships, for nursing students.

Adjustment of Price Supports for Milk (S. 4206) pocket vetoed by the President January 4, 1975.—This bill required that from this date of enactment of this legislation to March 31, 1976, that the support price of manufactured milk be established at not less than 85 percent of the parity price therefor. Also, the bill required the Secretary of Agriculture—beginning with the second quarter of 1975—thereafter adjust the support price for milk at the beginning of each quarter to reflect any change during the immediately preceding quarter in the index of prices paid by farmers for production items, interest, taxes, and wage rates.

Agricultural Conservation Time Extension Act (S. 3943) pocket vetoed by the President January 4, 1975.—The purpose of this bill was to extend the time for using funds appropriated to carry out the 1973 rural environmental assistance program and the 1974 rural environmental conservation program. Specifically, the time within which producers may request and receive approval for cost-sharing assistance under the two programs noted above was extended to December 31, 1975, and funds appropriated for such programs to remain available for making payments to eligible producers until December 31, 1976, for practices carried out during the period July 1, 1972, to December 31, 1975.

Improve Quality of Filberts Act (H.R. 2933) pocket vetoed by the President January 4, 1975.—The intent of H.R. 2933 was to include filberts as one of the commodities which enjoy the benefits of section 8e of the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act of 1937, as amended. The 1937 Act, as amended, which now includes some 16 commodities states, in essence, that if a domestic marketing order establishes certain grade and quality standards then imports of that same commodity must meet equivalent standards.

Authorizing Appropriations for Fiscal 1975 Maritime Program (H.R. 13296) pocket vetoed by the President January 4, 1975.—This bill authorized the appropriations for the fiscal year 1975 for certain maritime programs of the Department of Commerce. Provided for the acquisition, construction, and reconditioning of ships, ship operating-differential subsidies, research and development, reserve fleet expenses, and financial assistance for maritime training.

Ford Federal Office Building (H.R. 11897) pocket vetoed by the President January 4, 1975.—This bill provided that the United States Courthouse and Federal Office Building in Grand Rapids, Michigan, be designated the "President Gerald R. Ford Federal Office Building."

² Late enactment of authorizations prevented Congress from including a number of programs in the regular appropriations bills which normally encompass them. Instead these amounts were appropriated in the Supplemental for fiscal 1975. However, to preserve comparability with Administration requests, the requested amounts for such programs are included in the sums for the regular appropriations bills. This is the procedure used by the Joint Committee on Reduction of Federal Expenditures, which issues scorekeeping reports on appropriations actions. Because the Supplemental was passed late in the session, the Joint Committee has yet to subtract from the total for the Supplemental those amounts distributed among the regular appropriations. Accordingly, the supplemental figure in this table is higher than the final supplemental total to be reported by the Joint Committee.

THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE ANACONDA CO. AND MAJOR BANKS

HON. LEE METCALF

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, on September 18, 1974, I submitted a statement to the Senate Commerce Committee in support of S. 3955, the Foreign Investment Review Act of 1974, whose principal author was the junior Senator from Ohio (Mr. METZENBAUM). In my statement I stressed the importance—if Congress wants to inform itself regarding foreign ownership—of obtaining information regarding corporate debtholders. As I stated to the Commerce Committee:

No reporting system intended to measure and illustrate the impact of foreign investment on American corporations can be effective unless it encompasses the creditors of corporations.

To illustrate the important role of debtholders in corporate affairs I described the manner in which Chase Manhattan and other major creditors of the Anaconda Co. exercised control over that corporation following the Chilean takeover of Anaconda properties. I ask unanimous consent to insert as exhibit A my statement to the Commerce Committee.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXHIBIT A

STATEMENT BY SENATOR LEE METCALF, SEPTEMBER 18, 1974, SENATE COMMERCE COMMITTEE, SUBCOMMITTEE ON FOREIGN COMMERCE AND TOURISM ON S. 3955, FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW OF 1974

I welcome the opportunity to comment on S. 3955, just as I welcome the opportunity to cosponsor the legislation with the distinguished junior Senator from Ohio (Mr. Metzenbaum). He has focused the attention of the Senate, and that of a good part of the nation's financial leadership as well, on the increasing acquisition of interests in U.S. firms by foreign investors.

The studies and hearings regarding corporate ownership and control conducted during this Congress by two Government Operations Subcommittees—my Subcommittee on Budgeting, Management and Expenditures and Senator Muskie's Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations—provide abundant evidence of the need for improvements in collection and publication of data regarding corporate ownership and control, domestic as well as foreign.

Congress has already provided seven independent regulatory commissions with sweeping authority to collect such information, and to make it available to other agencies and the public. (The pertinent statutes are cited or reprinted in Appendix A of Senate Document 93-62, Disclosure of Corporate Ownership, and Appendix B of Part two of the "Corporate Disclosure" hearings conducted this year by the two Government Operations Subcommittees.)

In hearings at which the various commission chairmen testified, and in follow up meetings between their and our staffs, and the General Accounting Office, we are developing uniform reporting requirements dealing with corporate ownership and control. These requirements will necessarily deal with both foreign and domestic investments in U.S. firms. S. 3955 wisely provides, in Section 4(b), that the Secretary of Commerce may receive from other agencies information relating to foreign investment. Use of independent commissions, for the collection of data, is preferable to establishing a new and duplicating system within the Department of Commerce.

In the event that additional information is needed by Commerce which the commissions do not have, S. 3955 provides in Section 7(d) that questionnaires to firms be coordinated by the General Accounting Office with those of independent Federal regulatory agencies. This provision should reduce burden on business and help obtain maximum information for the Commerce Department to use in carrying out other sections of the act.

Our study, "Disclosure of Corporate Ownership" (Senate Document 93-62) dealt primarily with stock holdings and voting rights to that stock. S. 3955 likewise deals primarily with stock ownership. Our hearings and subsequent studies have brought home the importance of debtholdings as levers of control. Therefore, I would strongly suggest that S. 3955 be amended to provide for consideration of debtholdings in corporations as a factor in achieving control.

The proposed bill should include a provision requiring disclosure of major debt holdings in corporations covered by the bill. The levers of control over corporate activities possessed by creditors are more easily identified and more readily enforced than the control influence represented by substantial equity holdings. Major corporate creditors are not only able to influence the policies and operations of a corporation through representation on the board of directors like equity holders, but are also able to limit normal corporate activities through contractual restrictions contained in loan indentures.

Violations of indenture restrictions—examples of which shall follow—activate the default provisions of the loan indenture. This may either lead to use of specific self-help remedies written into the agreement or a general legal cause of action for breach of contract. There is no requirement—that creditors first seek redress from corporate management or through the corporate elective process before pursuing their contractual and legal remedies—as there is for shareholders in derivative suits. Furthermore, control exercised by creditors under a loan indenture can be quite specific and as restrictive as desired so long as it is legal. Finally, most indentures contain a provision allowing for waiver or amendment of the original agreement by vote of a specified majority of that class of debt holders, thus leaving the majority in a position to extract conditions from management in return for their cooperation. No reporting system intended to measure and illustrate the impact of foreign investment on American corporations can be effective unless it encompasses the creditors of corporations.

An example of the dominating influence creditors can have on a major corporation is found in the recent history of the Anaconda Company, the third largest producer of primary copper and among the ten largest aluminum producers in the United States. A consortium of banks led by the Chase Manhattan Bank, was able to gain actual operational control of this corporation through their position as the primary creditors of Anaconda. Information detailing the identity of Anaconda's major debt holders is not completely available, and the data which is available can only be retrieved by a time-consuming search of the company's file at the Securities and Exchange Commission. The public reports issued by the company only disclose the amount of long and short term debt outstanding and do not identify the primary creditors by name or describe the restrictions contained in the loan indentures. Such information is basically available in the 8K and 10K reports required to be filed with the SEC, but it is not compiled in a readily usable format. Interested persons must arduously dig through voluminous files. There is no present system for reporting the identity of those holding publicly traded debt securities, and thus there is no way of identifying the persons, institutions or governments who may vote to enforce or waive provisions of trust indentures in return for special considerations.

The influence of major creditors on the operations of Anaconda dates back at least to 1961 when three of the ten members on the board of directors represented financial institutions with which Anaconda had a debtor relationship. To those three—Brown Brothers Harriman, Citibank and Metropolitan Life—a fourth was added in 1966 when an officer of Chase Manhattan Bank joined the board. The next year, 1967, Anaconda reported a $125 million revolving line of credit with a group of New York banks, and approximately $73 million had been borrowed under that line by the end of the year.

On April 1, 1968, the company announced a new credit agreement for $75 million with Chase Manhattan, Chemical Bank, Citibank, Morgan Guaranty, and several smaller banks. The agreement provided for modification of the lending terms by vote of those holding 60% of the total amount committed or outstanding—60% being the exact percentage held by the four largest banks participating in the loan.

Anaconda made its first public debt sale with a $150 million debenture offering on December 1, 1968. A substantial portion of the proceeds was used to retire the amount outstanding on the original $125 million revolving credit and the bulk of the remainder was used to pay off other debt. Chase Manhattan was named trustee under the trust indenture and thus was placed in the position of exercising the discretionary enforcement provisions of the indenture.

The indenture provides that the trustee shall initiate action in event of default and even prohibits individual suits by holders unless written notice is given to the trustee, reasonable indemnity for costs related to the suit is offered, 25% of the holders have requested the trustee to act, and he has failed to act.

The trustee is also granted a preference in the repayment of short-term loans made to the company within four months of a major default. No approval of the holders is needed for the trustee to make the indenture more restrictive for their benefit or for him to interpret ambiguities in the indenture. The indenture specifically allows for Chase to continue to have one representative on the Anaconda board of directors.

Debenture holders are also granted substantial powers by the indenture. Those holding the majority of the principal amount outstanding can waive past defaults not affecting payments of principal or interest. They can also direct the trustee to pursue remedies under the indenture in a specified manner and can actually remove the trustee if they are not satisfied with him. A two-thirds majority of the holders may execute supplemental indentures in league with the company and all holders are bound by such agreements.

The trust indenture restricts certain corporate activities much like the credit agreement executed with the banks. There are prohibitions against Anaconda permitting prior mortgages and liens, sales or leasebacks of property, and certain mergers. The company also is pledged not to take advantage of any stay or extension law which affects the trust indenture covenants.

The $75 million bank credit agreement was increased to $100 million on July 1, 1969, and more banks were added to the consortium. Five days earlier, on June 26, Anaconda had announced that most of its Chilean operations were to be nationalized under a plan providing immediate compensation for 51% of the properties and a future negotiated settlement for the remainder.

A new $250 million revolving credit agreement was signed on May 1, 1970, replacing the existing $100 million line. Eighteen banks participated in the agreement, but five large New York banks, including Chase Manhattan, Chemical Bank, Manufacturers Hanover, Morgan Guaranty and Citibank, accounted for 60% of the amount to be loaned. Once again, the specified majority needed to alter the terms of the agreement was 60%.

One restriction on corporate activities which was written into the agreement, and subject to waiver by the five principal banks at their discretion was that current assets must exceed current liabilities by $225 million or 20% of sales. Another was that the company could not obtain any other debt by permitting a prior lien on its assets. Anaconda was also restricted as to the sale and leaseback of its assets and the sale of more than 25% of the stock in any major subsidiary. Violation of those and other restrictions was included as one of the specific conditions of default.

Events in Chile during 1971 had a profound effect on Anaconda's credit relationships. On July 16, 1971, the President of Chile issued a decree nationalizing all major copper-producing properties which nullified the company's previous formal compensation agreement with the Chilean government. In October, Chile announced that Anaconda would not receive compensation for most of its nationalized properties because the company had taken the fair value of those properties in "excessive profits" during earlier years.

In February 1972, Anaconda filed claims aggregating $174.4 million with the Overseas Private Investment Corporation, a Federal government corporation which had assumed the responsibility for expropriation insurance from the Agency for International Development in 1971. OPIC admitted liability for only $12 million and the dispute over the rest has been in the courts ever since.

The political problems faced by Anaconda's management in Chile were matched by their credit problems with major bank lenders in New York. The company was forced to report a loss of $358 million for 1971 in contrast to the $64 million profit reported in 1970. The dividend per share decreased from $1.90 in 1970 to $.50 in 1971 and no dividends at all were declared for the last two quarters of the year. During the midst of this financial turmoil, Anaconda announced that John B. M. Place had been elected chairman of the board, president and chief executive officer. Mr. Place had been on Anaconda's board since 1969 representing Chase Manhattan Bank, the trustee for Anaconda's $150 million of public debentures and one of the lead banks in the company's May 1, 1970 revolving credit agreement for $250 million. Several existing officers and directors resigned or gave notice of retirement during this period.

After the ascendancy of Mr. Place to chief operating officer, Anaconda's pattern of debt relations changed dramatically. On April 19, 1971, before President Allende announced his nationalization plan, the company had borrowed $160 million under the $250 million bank credit agreement. The loan balance was reduced to $110 million by the end of 1971, and was paid off entirely and the credit agreement terminated on July 31, 1972.

The effect on Anaconda of giving priority to satisfying its major bank creditors is reflected in the percentage of the company's total financial resources which was devoted to reducing long term debt. In 1970, Anaconda used 2.2% of its total financial resources for the reduction of long term debt. That figure rose to 28% for 1971 due to the reductions occurring after the Chilean nationalization announcement. In 1972, more than 47% of total resources was used to reduce long term debt. The amount of long term debt outstanding declined 28% from the end of 1971 to the end of 1972.

Money devoted to reducing long term debt cannot be used to purchase productive plant and equipment, so Anaconda was forced to cut back its expansion and modernization program. The company was able to obtain alternate financing for some of its activities. A $30 million credit agreement was arranged with a consortium of smaller banks during the fall of 1971, and a $20 million loan was obtained from Security Pacific National Bank in March of this year. An arrangement involving a direct $28 million loan to the company and Anaconda's guarantee of a $72 million loan as part of a leaseback was worked out with three large insurance companies and some banks in June 1972. The major New York banks have not given Anaconda a major extension of credit since being paid off in July 1972.

Anaconda's rapid repayment to major bank lenders under the direction of Mr. Place, a former Chase representative, illustrates the fundamental advantages of the creditor over the shareholder. Shareholders generally have no right to redeem their stock with a corporation and thus remove their capital from the use of the corporation, especially when adversity arises and the company needs all of its financial resources. Influential creditors, however, can reclaim their capital at the very time when it is most needed. The possibility of a substantial and rapid cash drain is not lost on corporate managements, and major creditors are treated accordingly. The power and influence of major lenders cannot be underestimated.

The Anaconda experience illustrates very well the power of major creditors to influence corporate policy through participation on the board of directors and to actually achieve operational control in some cases. The threat of losing credit and the resulting effect on financing present and future operations is much more real to most corporate managements than the threat of a shareholder takeover. Managements have great control over the terms of the corporate charter and by-laws governing the rights of shareholders. But loan indentures are designed by creditors to protect their interests and the terms remain fixed for the length of the contractual agreement. The ability of creditors to exact stringent limitations on corporate activity and to influence managements by the offering or withholding of credit is even greater during times of tight money such as the present.

The potential influence of commercial loan creditors can be readily assessed by identifying the financial institution, the amount of the loan, the terms of the indenture, and the representatives from the institution who are actively involved in the affairs of the corporation. Major corporations already file such data with the SEC. However, it is very difficult and time consuming to sort it out. It should present no greater burden to report it in a relevant format consistent with the provisions of this bill.

In regard to public debt offerings, there is urgent need to establish a reliable reporting system for the purpose of identifying significant holders of a corporation's debt. Holders of bonds and debentures have powers similar to those of banks under a credit agreement, in that specified numbers of the holders may petition the trustee for enforcement or waiver of indenture provisions and can even replace the trustee if they desire. Trading of these debt securities can very easily lead to concentration of ownership in a person or institution representing a foreign interest.

The amount and terms of the trust indenture as well as the identity of the trustee can presently be retrieved from SEC reports, even though the process is difficult. But there is currently no way of determining who has the power to exert the levers of control represented by substantial public debt holdings.

The potential for substantial foreign influence through debt holdings is perhaps even greater than through equity holdings, due to the nature of the debtor-creditor relationship. The example of Anaconda vividly demonstrates that it would be a serious oversight not to require timely and periodic reporting of major corporate debt holdings.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to comment, and would be pleased to provide such additional information from our studies as your members may desire. With your permission, I shall include for the hearing record a pertinent excerpt from the article, "Corporate Ownership and Control: The Large Corporation and the Capitalist Class," by Professor Maurice Zeitlin of the University of Wisconsin. His article appeared in the March, 1974 issue of The American Journal of Sociology.

"We know, for instance, that the largest corporations in the United States are now typically 'multinational' or 'transnational' in the sense that the 'sheer size of their foreign commitment,' as Fortune puts it (Rose 1968, p. 101), and the 'extent of their involvements' is such that, to some degree, these companies now regard the world rather than the nation state as their natural and logical operating area. Is it the 'management' of these corporations that determine their broad policies? Or do the individuals, families, and other principal proprietary interests with the greatest material stake in these corporations impose their conceptions of the issues and demand that their objectives are pursued in order to maintain the 'world... as their natural and logical operating area'? Here, clearly, we verge, once again, on the class questions raised at the outset of this article. To take a more limited issue, however: many of the multinational corporations face increasing risk of nationalization of their foreign properties. 'Management' may plan for such contingencies, exercise their 'discretion,' and decide on the tactics to be adopted. When their planning goes awry or proves ineffective, however, must the management answer to their corporation's principal shareholders and other proprietary interests (such as banks) or not? Having left management in charge of the everyday operations of the corporations abroad, with little or no interference, do the principal proprietary interests have the power to interfere when deemed necessary?"

"Without an analysis of concrete situations and the specific control structure of the corporations involved, we cannot answer such questions—though occasionally particular events momentarily illuminate the actual relationships involved (though they may still remain largely in the shadows). Thus, for example, the Chilean properties of Kennecott Copper Corporation and Anaconda Company were recently (1971) nationalized in Chile. These two corporations, which owned the major copper mines of Chile, had adopted different longrange strategies to deal with the rising probability of nationalization. We cannot explore the details here, but suffice it to say that Kennecott's strategy was reportedly aimed at insuring, as Robert Haldeman, executive vice-president of Kennecott's Chilean operations explained, 'that nobody expropriates Kennecott without upsetting customers, creditors, and governments on three continents' (Moran 1973, pp. 279-80). Kennecott was able to 'expand very profitably in the late 1960's with no new risk to itself and to leave, after the nationalization in 1971, with compensation greater than the net worth of its holdings had been in 1964. In contrast, Anaconda, which had not spread its risk or protected itself through a strategy of building transnational alliances, lost its old holdings, lost the new capital it committed during the Frei regime [preceding Allende's socialist administration], and was nationalized in 1971 without any hope of compensation' (Moran 1973, pp. 280-81).

"Now, according to Berle and Means (1967, p. 104) and Lerner (1970, pp. 74-79), both Kennecott and Anaconda have long been under 'management control.' In Kennecott's case, there is relatively persuasive evidence that it is, in fact, probably controlled by the Guggenheim family and associated interests rather than by 'management.' Whether this is so or not, Kennecott's 'successful tactics' in Chile did not test the reality of its alleged control by management. However, Anaconda's 'management' was submitted to a rather clear test of the extent to which it had control. Within two months after the Chilean government 'intervened' in Anaconda's properties and a month after it took over Anaconda Sales Corporation's control of copper sales, it was announced in the New York Times (May 14, 1971, p. 55) that Mr. John B. Place, a director of Anaconda, and a vice-chairman of the Chase Manhattan Bank (one of its four top officers, along with David Rockefeller, chairman, and the president and another vice-chairman) was to become the new chief executive officer of the Anaconda Company. (Other Anaconda directors who were bankers included James D. Farley, an executive vice-president of First National City Bank, and Robert V. Roosa, a partner in Brown Brothers, Harriman and Company.)

As the New York Times reporter (Walker 1971) explained, Mr. Place had no mining expertise ('It is assumed he would not know a head frame from a drag line'), and though he had been an Anaconda director since 1969, he 'lives in the East and has never attended the annual [stockholders] meeting held regularly in Butte, Montana,' where Anaconda's most important American copper mines are located. In the wake of this Chase Manhattan officer's installation as Anaconda's chief executive officer, at least 50% of the corporate staff, including John G. Hall, Anaconda's former president, 'were fired. Chairman [C. Jay] Parkinson took early retirement' (Business Week, February 19, 1972, p. 55). The declination of Anaconda's allegedly controlling management illustrates the general proposition that those who really have control can decide when, where, and with respect to what issues and corporate policies they will intervene to exercise their power."

Mr. METCALF. On October 29, Mr. John B. M. Place, chairman, president, and chief executive officer of Anaconda, sent me a letter taking exception to some of my statements to the Commerce Committee. His letter also appeared in a number of newspapers as an Anaconda Co. advertisement. I ask unanimous consent to insert Mr. Place's letter at this point in the Record as exhibit B.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

EXHIBIT B

ANACONDA,
October 29, 1974.

HON. LEE METCALF,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR METCALF: I was deeply disappointed and dismayed to read the statement you presented September 18, 1974 to the Senate Commerce Committee on S. 3955, the Foreign Investment Review Act of 1974. The statement only came to my attention in the last week.

Many of the comments in the statement about myself and The Anaconda Company are untrue and incorrect inferences are drawn. Unfortunately, the statement is being widely quoted in the press to our detriment and harm. You know, Senator, we are always available to you and your staff and will cooperate in any way to give you correct information. By failing to contact us or to adequately research the matter, damaging untruths have been perpetrated through the statement.

The statement says that "a consortium of banks, led by the Chase Manhattan Bank, was able to gain actual operational control of this corporation (Anaconda) through their position as the primary creditors of Anaconda." That statement is not true. No bank, group of banks, or any other creditor has, in my memory, controlled Anaconda or dictated in any way the events you refer to or played any part in my joining Anaconda.

The statement also refers to our steps in reducing long-term indebtedness in 1972 and states, "Money devoted to reducing long-term debt cannot be used to purchase productive plant and equipment, so Anaconda was forced to cut back its expansion and modernization program." That allegation is incorrect. During this period (1972), we were able to reduce our medium-term bank loans. This step gave us the flexibility we required to restructure our finances. We entered into a long-term lease, insurance company loan, and public pollution control financing arrangements. We then were able to accelerate our capital spending programs. Since 1972, in our own state, Montana, we completed the new flue program at Anaconda, spent $34 million in phase I of our smelter pollution control program, embarked on phase II of the program ($33 million), constructed the revolutionary new Arbuter Hydrometallurgical plant at Anaconda ($40 million), developed the East Continental Pit, re-opened the Anaconda concentrator, expanded the Butte concentrator, and are now expanding the Great Falls refinery. Never has one company done so much in such a short period of time in Montana to "purchase productive plant and equipment." During this period we have had major capital programs throughout the company at total costs of $90 million in 1971, $122 million in 1972 and $80 million in 1973.

Here is what really happened. At the request of the internal management of Anaconda, I was elected to the board of directors of Anaconda in 1969. At the time I was Vice Chairman of Chase Manhattan Bank. Chase was one of the many banks that do business with Anaconda and one of a number of major lenders and was and still is Trustee under the 1968 indenture for the bonds sold by Anaconda in the public market. Anaconda was not in default on any of its loan agreements and there was no bank, including Chase, in a position to call its loans. No loans have ever been repaid to particular creditors, including Chase, that in any way discriminated against any other creditors or equity owners. The enforcement provisions of the indenture or loan agreements come into play only in the event of default. That situation has not occurred.

In 1971 the management of Anaconda invited me to join the company as president and chief executive officer. The Chase bank had nothing to do with that selection. No other creditor had anything to do with that selection. After other members of the board approved my employment, I joined Anaconda on June 1, 1971. I resigned from my office and directorship at the Chase bank, thus severing all connections at that time.

In 1970 our principal revolving credit line with a number of major banks was increased from $100 million to $250 million. In 1971 our Chilean properties were, as you know, expropriated without payment of compensation, and we had a three-month strike in our Western mines. In this extremely dark period we temporarily drew down on our revolving credit to see us through pending establishment of long term credit and other financing arrangements. By late 1971, we had taken down approximately $160 million of the available $250 million.

Contrary to the inference that repayments were for the benefit of the banks, it was for the benefit of the company. The burden of heavy medium-term debt necessarily incurred was imposing. To expand our operation, modernize and replace our lost Chilean production, it was essential that we reduce and readjust our short-term debt load. We were successful in achieving that goal. The proceeds from the sale of our Montana forest lands ($117 million) were used in that debt reduction program. Timber and lumber production was not our principal line of business and the sale to a major forest products company was beneficial for both parties. Our major financing was the leasing arrangement for our Seabee, Kentucky aluminum plant ($110 million) in 1972. We also arranged for smelter pollution control bonds in Montana and insurance company and other long term financing.

The banks did not request or choose to have our loans repaid. They would have preferred a continuance of credit to a sound credit risk company like Anaconda because banks generate their income by interest on loans. You state, "the major New York banks have not given Anaconda a major extension of credit since being paid off in July, 1972." The point is we haven't needed or asked for major bank credit since July, 1972. We have open and unused credit lines and you can be sure that bank credit is available to us as we need it.

You state that, "shareholders generally have no right to redeem their stock with a corporation and thus remove their capital from the company needs all of its financial resources. Influential creditors, however, can reclaim their capital at the very time when it is most needed." That quotation reflects a basic misconception of the nature of equity capital as compared to debt. Shareholders are the owners and so long as they retain their shares (which, incidentally, they can sell at any time), they share the risks and the rewards of the business. Lenders have the right of repayment of principal plus interest and usually do not share in the profits of the business. Of necessity, creditors have priority over shareholders. This does not, however, mean that the creditors have operational control of the business. The relationship of shareholders and creditors is not a matter of priorities but a matter of completely different positions.

Because the unfortunate and incorrect use of Anaconda as an example of creditor control of business has had so much publicity, I would appreciate a clarification in the hearing record on S. 3955. Because of the wide exposure given to the statement and the reactions we have received from shareholders and employees, you will understand why we feel obliged to send copies of this letter to publications that quoted from the statement, especially newspapers in Montana.

Respectfully,

JOHN B. M. PLACE.

Mr. METCALF. Every observation and factual assertion in my statement to the Senate Commerce Committee was abundantly supported by reports prepared by the Anaconda Co. itself or reputable business publications. Mr. Place's criticism in every instance involved interpretation of events rather than the factual accuracy of the events themselves.

As a primary participant, Mr. Place undoubtedly has a unique vantage point from which to evaluate the stated chain of events. However, his very role as participant necessarily makes his evaluation subjective. Not only is his view subject to personal judgments of his own motives, but also to the well-known inability of most people to see themselves as others see them.

My evaluation was based on observation of the facts on public record. This is truly an example of the facts speaking for themselves. It is an undeniable fact that John Place represented Chase Manhattan Bank on the Anaconda board of directors beginning in 1969, that he subsequently became Anaconda's chief executive in 1971, and that under his direction the company voluntarily and promptly repaid $160 million to a consortium of banks during a period when Anaconda reported the largest single loss in history.

Chase was one of the lead banks benefitting from that policy. The motives of Mr. Place and other participants do not alter the final result of the chain of events related in my statement.

The purpose of my statement to the Senate Commerce Committee was to use the Anaconda experience as an example of what might result from a debtor-creditor relationship in order to show the need for proper reporting of corporate debt arrangements. The statement did not attempt to make a judgment as to the propriety or impropriety of the management changes at Anaconda. My concern was the result reached and the extent to which proper reporting might have indicated that result. For my purposes, it was not necessary to find impropriety in the sequence of events that occurred.

In fact, the thrust of the statement was to relate the normal and presently accepted types of relations which exist between corporate creditors and debtors. Mr. Place may not feel that he came to head Anaconda through his position on its board representing one of Anaconda's major creditors, but Business Week, the New York Times, Professor Zeitlin, and others have drawn that inference from their sources and the facts on record.

My own research and that of my staff did not disclose any significant holdings of Anaconda common stock by Chase Manhattan. Mr. Place owned only 100 shares of stock in Anaconda. I believe it is fair to infer that Mr. Place became chief operating officer by means of the debt relationship then existing between Anaconda and Chase.

A detailed analysis of the inconsistent statements in Mr. Place's letter follows.

REBUTTAL TO 29 OCTOBER LETTER FROM ANACONDA CO. PRESIDENT JOHN B. M. PLACE

The best way to rebut the inconsistent and misleading statements in Mr. Place's letter is to set forth in sequence the paragraphs containing his allegations with a documented response to each charge. Except for the noted magazine and newspaper articles, all of the rebuttal materials were copied from Anaconda's annual reports distributed to the public and from the 10K annual reports available for public inspection at the SEC. The letter excerpts are inserted as follows:

The Metcalf statement says that "a consortium of banks, led by the Chase Manhattan Bank, was able to gain actual operational control of this corporation (Anaconda) through their position as the primary creditors of Anaconda." That statement is not true. No bank, groups of banks, or any other creditor has, in my memory, controlled Anaconda or dictated in any way the events you refer to or played any part in my joining Anaconda.

I ask unanimous consent to have exhibits C and D inserted at this point in the Record.

Please refer to the italicized portions of exhibits C and D appearing at the end of this rebuttal. The first is from the February 19, 1972, issue of Business Week, a McGraw-Hill publication with a general probusiness viewpoint. It notes that Anaconda's lenders wanted someone with their view to head the company and that half of the existing management was either fired or early retired.

Exhibit D is from the May 23, 1971, edition of the New York Times. It points out the role of the major lenders as well as the fact that Mr. Place had no geographical ties or experience in mining to qualify him for the chief executive position. His banking background was the obvious reason for his selection.

Also note the view of Professor Zeitlin printed at the end of the Metzenbaum bill statement.

There being no objection, the exhibits were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

BELEATED SOUL-SEARCHING

... Anaconda had plenty of time and certainly ample capital to take steps to offset the loss of its nationalized Chilean mines. An early warning to U.S. companies that their properties would be nationalized was sounded in 1964 by the election of Eduardo Frei, who called for "Chileanization" of copper, which supplied the country with nearly 80% of its export trade.

Kennecott took the warning seriously and bent with the winds of nationalization in the hope that it would not be whirled away. It sold a 51% interest in its huge El Teniente mine to Chile in 1967, and had a good deal—as long as it lasted. The $80-million it got for the 51% interest was loaned to its Chilean government partner, which used the money to expand the mine.

While Chile nationalized the copper mines in July, without compensation for the U.S. owners, Kennecott lost the source of what was then 15% of its total earnings. It has still to take a writeoff on its Chilean losses.

As it continued to hope that its mines would escape nationalization, Anaconda kept pouring more capital into Chile—some $200-million in the three years ended in 1969. Late that year, under direct threat of expropriation, Anaconda finally agreed to sell 51% of its Chuquibambilla and El Salvador-Potrerillos mining properties to Chile. A third and newer mine, the Exotica, was from the start owned 75% by Anaconda and 25% by Chile.

Just six months before the 1970 elections that brought Marxist Salvador Allende to power, Anaconda encountered serious production problems. To escape suits over nondelivery, it invoked a disaster clause in its contract, releasing it from its production schedule obligations. Anaconda's action did not sit well, particularly in an emotionally charged election year.

That error simply compounded the problems created by the fight against Chileanization. Interestingly, Anaconda had apparently enjoyed better relations than Kennecott in Chile. Former Chairman Charles M. Brinckerhoff spoke fluent Spanish and was a personal friend of Frei. "This kept alive the illusion," says one industry executive, "that Anaconda would always be welcome in Chile."

In 1968, C. Jay Parkinson, who had been running the company's U.S. operations as president, succeeded Brinckerhoff as chief executive. Both men refused to sell an interest in the Chuquibambilla and El Salvador mines. The reason was obvious: A former Anaconda employee says that production costs at these mines amounted to about 18¢ per lb. for copper that was bringing 60¢ on the London Metal Exchange. In the U.S., copper costing 30¢ per lb. to produce sold at that time for 35¢.

"Anaconda was told Chileanization or else," says a man who was a top mining executive in Chile prior to the 1970 election. "They wound up with the 'or else,' which was nationalization, because they could not read the handwriting on the wall."

Moreover, the U.S. government is claiming that Anaconda's $175-million in expropriation insurance was voided when the company sold the 51% interest in its mines.

THE IMPACT OF A NEW BROOM

The deteriorating situation in Chile precipitated a search in New York for a new chief executive to replace Parkinson. Says an Anaconda director: "The company was big in metallurgical, geological, and scientific skills, but somewhat weaker in the financial and business judgment end." Parkinson was a lawyer; the president, John G. Hall, was a mining engineer. The company's board, probably prodded by its bankers, which included Chase Manhattan, concluded that the company needed a new man steeped in finance.

Place, who got the job, was already an Anaconda director. He joined the board in 1969 and quickly made his presence felt. He played a hand, for example, in selecting Charles H. Kraft, a financial specialist at U.S. Steel, to be Anaconda's treasurer in 1970.

A native New Yorker, Place attended St. Paul's School in Concord, N.H., the Citadel, and New York University, served in the Army for two years, and never finished college. He joined Chase Manhattan in 1946 as a member of the credit department, and within 10 years was a vice-president. In 1969, he made a hard run for the presidency of the bank, but lost out to Herbert Patterson. The opening at Anaconda created an opportunity for him to run his own show.

He has a reputation for thoroughly researching a project before making a move, which has led some former associates to say he is slow to make decisions. "He is a hard-driving person," says a former Anaconda director, "who felt the company was a real challenge, who accepts it, and wants to lick it. It takes a person of that sort to rebuild Anaconda."

One of the first things Place did was to conduct a corporate salary review. It opened up a Pandora's box. Place was shocked to find that there were neither job descriptions for some 80 top Anaconda posts, nor formal procedures to evaluate executive performance.

Place called in Edward N. Hay & Associates, a Philadelphia management consulting firm, which had developed an executive compensation plan at Chase Manhattan. The firm was directed to set up a similar plan for Anaconda and make a complete study of its management structure.

As John Hall, the former president, recalls: "It was obvious that there would be cutbacks, at least in proportion to the Chilean situation. The company had some 7,000 salaried employees, and maybe some 700 or less were directly involved in the Chile operation. Going strictly by the numbers, that meant a 10% cutback, and then a look at what else was necessary."

The Hay report cut much deeper than that. "It came as a surprise to everyone," says Hall, who never did see the report. "Apparently it indicated no slot for me." Nor for at least 50% of the rest of Anaconda's corporate staff, who along with Hall—who had been initially moved to a newly created post as vice-chairman—were fired. Chairman Parkinson took early retirement.

Place's reorganization has had a major impact on Anaconda's fabricating facilities. In the brass division, which has been in the red, four plants, representing about 5% of capacity, have been shut down. In the wire and cable division, whose earnings declined badly last year after a profitable performance in 1970, the president has taken early retirement.

Place says that he now wants to move Anaconda into "any growing and profitable area" that is related to the company's capabilities. The company's primary diversification effort—into aluminum, which accounts for about 15% of sales—has been a lackluster venture. Anaconda sidled into aluminum, starting as a fabricator, and then integrated backward when it saw it had to be a primary producer to make significant profits. To become wholly self-sufficient in ingot, Anaconda is building a $100-million reduction plant in Kentucky. Now the seventh-largest aluminum producer, Anaconda will become No. 4 when the new plant becomes operational in 1973.

With the Chilean mines lost, Anaconda now relies on its U.S. mines for virtually all its copper. (The company also has mines in Mexico.) Its Butte (Mont.) and smaller Yerington (Nev.) mines are both profitable. But the company miscalculated in planning for its newer, $200-million Twin Buttes (Ariz.) mine and is producing at economically marginal levels. Anaconda's U.S. mines now produce about 250,000 tons of copper a year; Place aims to hit 300,000 tons by 1975. Kennecott can now produce over 500,000 tons.

Neither company has immediate plans to develop new copper mines. Development expenses have gone so high that it now costs some $3,000 per ton of installed ore concentrate capacity. That is an increase of 50% in five years.

THE AIR POLLUTION SPECTER

A new factor in copper's equation is ecology, which has already deterred exploration operations in the western states. But the most crucial problem is the restrictive air pollution control laws slapped on smelters. Montana now requires that Anaconda's big 1-million-ton-capacity smelter near Butte be equipped by July, 1973, to capture 90% of the sulfur dioxide generated in the smelting process.

Place argues that his company is already spending some $30-million to control pollution, and that meeting the state emission requirements would cost another $22-million in what amounts to "environmental overkill." Other copper companies, including Kennecott, have been making similar arguments in Arizona. The copper companies say that it will cost over $500-million to meet federal pollution standards, or roughly some 4¢ per lb. of copper. The federal Environmental Protection Agency says it would only cost $110-million.

Citing pollution control costs, Magma Copper Co. last August shut its aged smelter in Superior, Ariz. Now Phelps Dodge says flatly that it will have to close one of its three Arizona smelters if the state sticks to its present standards.

Although the issue is still being hotly debated, pollution control problems are already slowing down smelting operations. For example, Asarco says that output of its smelters was cut 30,000 tons last year because of steps taken to conform to pollution control standards. In recent months, Kennecott, Anaconda, Phelps Dodge, and Pennzoil United's Duval subsidiary have curtailed concentrate production to work off inventories that have been backed up at smelters.

No copper company is eager to add smelting capacity in the face of costly pollution control requirements, which are still in a state of flux. Ironically, a bottleneck at the smelters could wind up cutting down the copper glut.

But regardless of how the copper market goes, Anaconda will continue to be in a financial pinch to offset mounting production costs and to find new sources of income to make up for the Chilean losses. "Raising money at Anaconda is a difficult test," says Ronald Shorr, copper analyst for Dean Witter. "But that's why John Place is there."

[From the New York Times, May 23, 1971]

A BANKER FOR ANACONDA—PRESIDENTIAL CHOICE SURPRISES BUTTE

(By Robert Walker)

BUTTE, MONT.—If Central Park were not a park, if the middle of Manhattan were an open-pit copper mine more than 1,000 feet deep, and if the city itself were more than a mile above sea level, in a valley between the mountain snows, a New Yorker might begin to get some hint of the favor of Butte.

This flavor helps explain why an announcement the other day that a New York banker without mining expertise would be installed at the end of this month as chief executive officer of the Anaconda Company, which was a mild surprise to the mining industry, came as the shock of 1971—so far—in this city.

It was not necessarily an unpleasant shock—maybe even good news—but it was a profound and sudden change.

Butte probably is as close as a place can get to being the definitive mining town. It is the birthplace and still the spiritual home of Anaconda. The company is the biggest employer, taxpayer and charitable institution, the entity that springs to mind when the residents—about 45,000 rugged individualists—hear phrases like "big business" or "corporate power."

Distant considerations—the sharp rise in New York-based Anaconda's long-term debt or the moves by the Chilean Government that have slashed recent sales, earnings and dividends—have not gone unnoticed but have done little to change the townspeople's ingrained awe of the company.

They tend to think of it as a Rocky Mountain copper-mining concern, although they are aware that it has mines in Mexico, Canada, South America and Australia. They also know it makes refrigerator tubing in Connecticut, aluminum foil in Georgia and electronics equipment in California.

According to veterans of the mining business here, there was no immediate hostility toward the newly-designated chief executive, John B. M. Place, a 44-year-old vice chairman of the Chase Manhattan Bank. Anaconda has a chief executive, C. Jay Parkinson, who is 61 years old and well known in Butte.

But this city rarely is hostile toward a man of whom few of the residents have ever heard. Mr. Place has been an Anaconda director since 1969, but he lives in the East and has never attended the annual meeting, held every year since 1895 in the nearby copper-smelting town of Anaconda.

Even after the announcement of his imminent appointment as president and chief executive—Mr. Parkinson will remain as chairman of the board—Mr. Place did not appear at the 1971 meeting, held last week. But the Montana residents—as opposed to shareholders who had driven or flown from distant states—seemed to accept the explanation that the man was busy winding things up at the bank.

Thus, while he remained something of an unknown quantity here, except to a handful of senior Anaconda supervisors in the Butte operations, and while it is assumed he would not know a head frame from a drag line, there still seems to be a feeling that a financial man might be what the company needs.

Perhaps the views of industry analysts and executives in New York travel fast. Several sources in New York said last week they had little doubt that Anaconda's lenders had wanted a new hand—preferably that of a financial executive—at the helm, although this was denied by Mr. Parkinson.

In any case, while union spokesmen in Montana insist that Anaconda's financial troubles are being exaggerated for effect in a contract-renewal year, its employees and the local residents who depend indirectly on the company for a living are aware that trouble is evident to anyone who can read.

The net income of Anaconda reached a peak in 1966, when the company earned $131.2-million after taxes, or $5.99 a share. The price of the shares on the New York Stock Exchange peaked two years later, rising to more than $66 after a major copper strike was settled in the spring of 1968.

Last year, on revenues of $977-million, net income was down to $63.8-million, or $2.91 a share, and the price of the stock ranged from a high of $32 to a low of $19. In the first quarter of this year, in extremely depressed conditions that were not expected to persist, profit was less than $4-million, or an annual rate of about $16-million.

The stock trading recently at about $22 a share suffered a sharp decline in yield in the latest three months, when the quarterly dividend was slashed to 25 cents a share from the previous level of 47.5 cents.

Recent revenues and earnings, including those for all of 1970, have been reported so that they exclude anything from the partly nationalized Chilean properties except dividends actually received in cash. The exclusion of Chilean dividends accrued but not paid, together with similar difficulties in Peru, cut Anaconda's reported profit last year alone by about $21-million, or $1 a share.

President Salvador Allende Gossens of Chile has repeatedly pledged that compensation will be paid after American-owned mining properties are fully expropriated. Mr. Parkinson told the annual meeting. The chairman added, however, that Chile would, in effect, assign any value it chose to the holdings of Anaconda, the Kennecott Copper Corporation and other United States investors.

Anaconda has expropriation insurance on the Chilean assets, written by the Agency for International Development, but there are two problems—the $260-million of insurance covers perhaps a quarter of the value placed by Anaconda on these assets, while A.I.D. has nothing like the billions of dollars the Chilean moves could cost insured United States investors. The agency probably would have to ask Congress for a staggering hand-out if all the claims were upheld. Mr. Parkinson indicated to the meeting last week.

While all this was happening overseas, one long-term development and one short-term development were squeezing the domestic earnings of Anaconda and other copper producers. The long-run change was that copper became much more capital-intensive than it used to be, partly because it became imperative to move and process bigger quantities of lower grades of ore. The ton of ore that used to yield 4 per cent copper gave way to a ton yielding 0.5 per cent.

In the Butte open-pit operations alone, for instance, Anaconda works around the clock with more than 100 trucks that carry 100 tons of ore each and cost about $200,000 apiece. The company has ordered some 150-ton vehicles that will cost $300,000 each. One tire for these new trucks would cost more than the average Chevrolet.

As a result of these and other capital costs, including rising pollution-control outlays, Anaconda's long-term debt, which was less than $100-million five years ago, exceeded $350-million by the end of 1970.

The short-run development was a series of declines late last year and early this year in the American producer price of copper, the price at which newly mined metal from domestic sources is sold to American industrial consumers.

This decline—which happened to accompany market weakness and price discounting in aluminum as well—recently has been halted, and the producer price of copper has turned slightly upward. The domestic industry is hoping for continued rise in American and world quotations.

This, in outline, is the situation Mr. Place will inherit when he takes over in less than two weeks as chief executive. Analysts have said that Anaconda is fundamentally in good condition, with proven copper reserves in politically safe locations sufficient for 25 years. The company is exploring other discoveries that probably are good for an additional 40 years of production at the projected rates of demand.

But can Anaconda—under Mr. Place or under anyone—develop these reserves, keep its fabricating facilities up to date, pay for the $100-million aluminum plant under construction at Sebré, Ky., and service and retire its debt while earning enough after taxes to maintain an attractive dividend rate?

"Maybe not," an officer of a competing producer remarked last week, "but then again maybe so. I think what the lenders wanted was mainly a change for the better in the morale at Anaconda's headquarters in New York. The morale in Butte is always great."

December 20, 1974

Mr. METCALF. The fact is that Mr. Place was elected to the chief executive spot from his position representing Chase Manhattan on the Anaconda board of directors. At the time of his election, the 10-member board had 4 outside directors representing financial institutions with which Anaconda had a debt relationship.

Of those institutions, two—Chase and Citibank—were lead banks in the $250 million revolving credit agreement under which Anaconda had borrowed $160 million at the time Mr. Place took office.

No one suggests that any bank or creditor ordered Anaconda to install someone with Mr. Place's background and connections in the chief operating position. The vagaries of corporate power and influence are much more subtle than that. Still, one can appreciate that well-timed suggestions or the unspoken realization of major creditors'—and fellow board members'—desires would be a dominant factor in a board decision to dramatically change corporate management. It seems implausible that C. J. Parkinson, chairman of the board, would seek early retirement and that John G. Hall, president, would be fired unless there was ample pressure to take such drastic measures.

Since that sort of pressure seems very unlikely from old line officer-directors who do not wind up in power, and top management harikari is likewise rare, it seems logical to infer that the outside directors representing major creditors may have provided the necessary pressure.

The statement also refers to our steps in reducing long-term indebtedness in 1972 and states, "Money devoted to reducing long-term debt cannot be used to purchase productive plant and equipment, so Anaconda was forced to cut back its expansion and modernization program." That allegation is incorrect. During this period (1972), we were able to reduce our medium-term bank loans.

This step gave us the flexibility we required to restructure our finances. We entered into a long-term lease, insurance company loan, and public pollution control financing arrangements. We then were able to accelerate our capital spending programs. Since 1972, in your own state, Montana, we completed the new flue program at Anaconda, spent $34 million in phase I of our smelter pollution control program, embarked on Phase II of the program ($33 million), constructed the revolutionary new Arbuter Hydrometallurgical plant at Anaconda ($40 million), developed the East Continental Pit, re-opened the Anaconda concentrator, expanded the Butte concentrator, and are now expanding the Great Falls refinery. Never has one company done so much in such a short period of time in Montana to "purchase productive plant and equipment." During this period we have had major capital programs throughout the company at total costs of $90 million in 1974, $122 million in 1972 and $80 million in 1973.

This is an example of the old numbers game—large numbers standing alone seem impressive. A comparison of capital expenditures in earlier years clearly shows a significant reduction in capital spending.

Capital expenditures for plant and equipment

1966	$117,050,000
1967	202,767,000
1968	153,843,000
1969	127,016,000
1970	90,491,000
1971	89,885,000
1972	122,599,000
1973	79,074,000

Source: Anaconda Co. Annual Reports.

Not only is the actual amount of reduced spending significant, but inflationary pressures decreased real expenditures even further.

Mr. Place's objection to the statement that Anaconda cut back its expansion program is surprising in view of his personal remarks to shareholders in Anaconda's 1971 annual report. On page four, he listed as "achievements" the following: Anaconda was restructured into a small company; 50 percent of the corporate staff was fired; several production facilities were closed down including one which had only just opened in 1970; the scope of geological, mining, and metallurgical research was reduced; and 3,000 employees lost their jobs. These "achievements" were described again on page 8 as "extraordinary measures" and "retrenchment programs."

Page 19 of the 1972 annual report also speaks of the events in terms of "extraordinary measures" and "significant programs of corporate reorganization and retrenchment." G. Webster defines retrenchment as "to cut short" or "to cut down." Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point supporting exhibits E, F, and G.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

... Turning to the achievements of the year, we have:

Restructured the company into a smaller, streamlined industrial organization. Lines of responsibility have been simplified, with operating units grouped into five profit centers. All primary metals operations with the exception of aluminum have been centralized into a new division with headquarters in Tucson, Arizona. The company's aluminum, brass, wire and cable, and forest products operations are organized into four other divisions.

Reduced the size of the corporate staff by more than 50 percent, simplifying its organization and eliminating activities which are no longer appropriate or necessary.

Closed several unprofitable production facilities, including the Caribou mine in New Brunswick; the Tooele, Utah, lead smelter; and four brass manufacturing plants. By mid-1972, we will complete closing of the Montana zinc operations which were facing unprofitability in the near future.

Reduced the scope of the geological, mining and metallurgical research operations and upgraded their efficiency. We are concentrating on improving the profitability of our existing mines in the United States, but we are still exploring.

Reduced the number of Anaconda's supervisory and operating personnel. The net reduction of the work force, due to the reorganization, was approximately 3,000 employees.

Set new corporate goals to develop fully our new management organization, to implement a strategy to increase our participation in free world markets, to institute a new capital expenditures control program designed to maximize return on shareholder's equity, and to operate each division so that it will be among the most profitable in its industry.

In addition, Anaconda filed early in February 1972, claims aggregating $171.4 million with Overseas Private Investment Corporation (OPIC), a corporation of the U.S. Government which early in 1971 assumed from the Agency for International Development (AID) the latter's portfolio of outstanding insurance against political risks issued by AID to U.S. foreign investors. The claims seek recovery of losses covered under contracts of guaranty issued by AID to Anaconda against expropriation risks. OPIC is considering the claims, but had previously announced that it disputes liability for all but approximately $12 million of Anaconda's claims, because of the transactions by which Chile obtained a 51 percent interest in, and contracted to buy the remainder of, the Chuquibambilla and El Salvador properties at the end of 1969. As for the disputed claims, Anaconda strongly disagrees with OPIC's position that the 1969 transactions impaired coverage under the contracts of guaranty. The transactions were negotiated by Anaconda, with the full knowledge, support and encouragement of the U.S. State Department, in order to avert the threatened expropriation of all of its investments in Chile. The transactions did not contravene any express or implied term of the contracts of guaranty, nor in any way alter the substance of Anaconda's insured interest in those of its investments in Chile which it had undertaken only after having negotiated in good faith with an agency of the U.S. Government (AID) for contractual insurance protection against expropriation risks.

If the parties fail to reach agreement, the contracts of guaranty provide that any dispute between OPIC and Anaconda is to be resolved by binding arbitration.

States. The organizational structure of the administrative and staff functions remaining in New York was streamlined to establish more positive lines of responsibility and greater efficiency.

Facing the loss of funds formerly generated by Chilean investments, the company was also required to institute retrenchment programs so as to direct the remaining funds into projects with the maximum potential for immediate or short-term returns. Several properties not meeting that criterion were or are being closed down, including the Caribou mine in New Brunswick, the unprofitable Tooele, Utah, lead smelter, and four brass manufacturing plants. Montana zinc operations, which had become only marginally profitable and are facing a severe reduction in the material available for treatment, will be closed by mid-1972. Retrenchments have also been effected in geological exploration and research, and in mining and metallurgical research programs.

The retrenchment programs have involved additional reductions in the number of Anaconda's supervisory and operating personnel. All told, the total work force, which averaged 30,800 in 1970, has been reduced to 27,000 in early 1972.

EXHIBIT G
ANACONDA 1972 ANNUAL REPORT

The expropriation of the company's investments in Chile, which in the past constituted a major source of its funds and profits, required management to take extraordinary measures so as to minimize the effects of the expropriation on the company's future profitability. Accordingly, in 1971 the company embarked upon significant programs of corporate reorganization and retrenchment, and provision for the costs of these programs was recorded in that year as an extraordinary charge against income. The provision comprised the costs incurred, or expected to be incurred, in connection with the severance or early retirement of terminated employees and in connection with facilities which were or are to be closed, including the write-down to estimated salvage value of investments in these facilities and in certain non-operating properties and projects.

On November 15, 1971 the company consummated the sale of a 51 percent interest in its copper producing property at Cananea, Mexico in accordance with the terms of an agreement with the Mexican Government. Net proceeds from the sale amounted to $21.6 million of which $16.2 million was received in cash. The accounts of Compania Minera de Cananea, S.A. are included in the consolidated financial statements through November 15, 1971. Subsequently, Anaconda's 49 percent investment in this company has been accounted for on an equity basis.

Mr. METCALF. Whether one uses the term "cutback" or "retrenchment," the simple facts are that capital spending was sharply reduced from earlier levels, several operations were closed down or curtailed, and employees were terminated. The Metzbaum bill statement did not say that all capital spending was halted, but only that expansion plans were cut back from previous expectations. The facts substantiate that assessment as do the statements of Anaconda and Mr. Place himself. As stated on page 8 of the 1971 annual report, the company switched from long range expansion plans "to direct the remaining funds into projects with the maximum potential for immediate or short-term returns." If the parties fail to reach agreement, the contracts of guaranty provide that any dispute between OPIC and Anaconda is to be resolved by binding arbitration.

Here is what really happened. At the request of the internal management of Anaconda, I was elected to the board of directors of Anaconda in 1969. At the time I was Vice Chairman of Chase Manhattan Bank. Chase was one of the many banks that do business with Anaconda and one of a number of major lenders and was and still is Trustee under the 1968 indenture for the bonds sold by Anaconda in the public market. Anaconda was not in default on any of its loan agreements and there was no bank, including Chase, in a position to call its loans. No loans have ever been repaid to particular creditors, including Chase, that in any way discriminated against any other creditors or equity owners. The enforcement provisions of the indenture or loan agreements come into play only in the event of default. That situation had not occurred.

Mr. Place actually underscores one of the primary points raised in the Metzbaum bill statement. Creditor influence goes far beyond the technical restrictions of loan indentures. In the case of Anaconda, the four outside directors representing institutional creditors constituted 40 percent of the board and had the same voting power and control over corporate activities as other directors. They were equal participants in determining the operations and future plans of the company. Even without direct representation on the board of directors, creditors have enormous impact on corporate policies through their power to provide or withhold financing for various projects. One of my major points was that Mr. Place became chief operating officer even though Anaconda had not violated any loan restrictions.

As Mr. Place correctly notes, no bank was in a position to call Anaconda's loans; however, the company could voluntarily prepay its loans. Cooperation from Anaconda management was therefore necessary to accomplish any prepayment of Anaconda's $160 million revolving credit loan in which Chase and Citibank were lead banks. The simple facts are that Mr. Place was elected chief executive from his position on the board representing Chase. Within 1 year Anaconda voluntarily prepaid the entire $160 million loan.

In 1971 the management of Anaconda invited me to join the company as president and chief executive officer. The Chase bank had nothing to do with that selection. No other creditor had anything to do with that selection. After other members of the board approved my employment, I joined Anaconda on June 1, 1971. I resigned from my office and directorship at the Chase bank, thus severing all connections at that time.

The companies on which Mr. Place serves as director were reported to the Federal Reserve Board in 1973 as follows:

Chemical Bank.—Chemical was another of the major banks participating in Anaconda's previous $250 million revolving credit.

Metropolitan Life.—Metropolitan is represented on Anaconda's board. It is now and has for several years been a major creditor of Anaconda.

Union Pacific.

Lever Brothers.

Celanese Corp.—Celanese is also represented on Anaconda's board.

Comsat.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

I quote again from Mr. Place's letter:

In 1970 our principal revolving credit line with a number of major banks was increased from $100 million to $250 million. In 1971 our Chilean properties were, as you know, expropriated without payment of compensation, and we had a three-month strike in our Western mines. In this extremely dark period we temporarily drew down on our revolving credit to see us through pending establishment of long term credit and other financing arrangements. By late 1971, we had taken down approximately $160 million of the available $250 million.

Contrary to the inference that repayments were for the benefit of the banks, it was for the benefit of the company. The burden of heavy medium-term debt necessarily incurred was imposing. To expand our operation, modernize and replace our lost Chilean production, it was essential that we reduce and readjust our short-term debt load. We were successful in achieving that goal. The proceeds from the sale of our Montana forest lands ($117 million) were used in that debt reduction program. Timber and lumber production was not our principal line of business and the sale to a major forest products company was beneficial for both parties. Our major financing was the leasing arrangement for our Sebree, Kentucky, aluminum plant ($110 million) in 1972. We also arranged for smelter pollution control bonds in Montana and insurance company and other long term financing.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD exhibits H, I, and J.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANACONDA 1972 ANNUAL REPORT

To The Shareholders:

We are pleased to report that 1972 saw the return of Anaconda to a position of profitability, to which all of the divisions contributed. We have strengthened the financial position of the company to gain flexibility for future growth, and we have resumed the payment of dividends on the common stock.

Anaconda had net earnings from operations for the year 1972 of $44,068,000 or $2.00 per share, compared with a loss of $6,205,000, or 28¢ a share for the year 1971. Total net earnings in 1972 were $133,037,000 or $6.03 a share, including extraordinary income of $88,969,000 or $4.03 a share. In 1971 the company reported a total loss of $353,844,000 or $16.16 a share, largely resulting from the expropriation of its investments in Chile.

The extraordinary gain in 1972 resulted principally from disposition of the assets of the Forest Products division.

Sales and other operating revenue were $1,012 billion in the year 1972, compared with $946.5 billion reported for 1971.

The company paid dividends of 12½ cents per share on its common stock on December 5, 1972 and March 5, 1973. Dividends had been suspended in the third quarter of 1971. The resumption continues Anaconda's record of paying dividends every year since 1936.

Shareholders' equity was increased by $130.6 million to $971.4 million.

The improved earnings in all divisions of the company in 1972 resulted from increased productivity, higher earnings of affiliated companies, a strengthening of the general economy, lower interest costs due to net reductions in long-term debt of $113.4 million, and a year relatively free of work stoppages.

December 20, 1974

Contributing also to the return to profitable operations were the significant cost reductions effected as part of the reorganization of the company in 1971. Continuing efforts to reduce costs in 1972 included the closing of the lead smelter at Tooele, Utah, and the consolidation of certain manufacturing operations in the Anaconda American Brass and the Anaconda Wire and Cable divisions.

In June the company sold the timberlands and mill of the Forest Products division in Montana to Champion International Corporation for $117 million. The forest lands were originally acquired to assure a supply of timber for the then extensive underground mining operations, and not in an effort to enter the forest products industry. Proceeds of the sale were applied to the reduction of long-term indebtedness and to increase working capital, materially strengthening the company's financial position.

EXHIBIT I

ANACONDA 1972 ANNUAL REPORT

FINANCIAL POSITION

Working capital increased $25.0 million to $291.0 million. An analysis of changes in working capital is summarized below:

	1972	1971
Increase (decrease) in current assets:
Cash and short-term securities	$11,277	$19,871
Receivables	35,639	36,924
Inventories and supplies	4,272	34,573
Prepaid expenses	60	2,208
Total	42,584	53,834
Decrease (increase) in current liabilities:
Long-term debt due within 1 year	3,316	19,982
Accounts payable and accrued expenses	13,553	44,292
Accrued taxes	7,306	3,628
Total	17,543	27,938
Increase (decrease) in working capital	25,041	25,896
Working capital at beginning of year	265,989	291,885
Working capital at end of year	291,030	265,989

Current receivables increased during the year by $35.6 million to $142.8 million at year end, including $21.1 million of reimbursable construction expenditures collected in January 1973. The balance of the increase in receivables relates to the higher volume of sales, and in particular to the 14.1% increase in sales and other operating revenue in the fourth quarter of 1972 over the comparable period of 1971.

To conserve working capital, it is one of the company's objectives to maintain inventories at levels consistent with its manufacturing and marketing programs. As a result of an improved control program, inventories of metals, manufactured products and supplies were reduced by $4.3 million in 1972. The sale of low-cost LIFO inventories had the effect of improving operating results after related tax effect by approximately $3.2 million.

Working capital provided by operations (excluding extraordinary items) amounted to $92.9 million for the year 1972, compared with $37.8 million in 1971.

Proceeds from the sale of timberlands and certain other assets of the Forest Products division, together with funds provided from operations, were used to retire indebtedness outstanding under revolving credit agreements with United States and foreign lenders. Long-term debt was reduced by $113.4 million in 1972. Interest expense for 1972 was reduced to $21.7 million, compared to $25.2 million in 1971.

Shareholders' equity increased $130.6 million, or $5.63 a share, to $971.4 million, or $44.04 a share.

December 20, 1974

Expenditures for plant and equipment aggregated $122.6 million during 1972, compared with $89.9 million in 1971. The major portion of expenditures in both years were for the construction of the new primary aluminum plant at Sebree, Kentucky, and air pollution control equipment at the Anaconda copper smelter.

ACCOUNTING CHANGES

To conform to opinions of the Accounting Principles Board, the company has retroactively adopted the equity method of accounting for investments in certain affiliated companies. Under this method, the equity in the net income of these affiliates is reflected currently in earnings rather than when realized through dividends. The effect of this accounting change was to increase income before extraordinary items for 1972 by $4.9 million (22¢ per share), and as previously reported for 1971, by $2.5 million (12¢ per share).

The continuing weakening of the U.S. dollar in relation to other currencies prompted the company in 1972 to reevaluate its previous practice for translating foreign currency accounts into U.S. dollars. In order to reflect its foreign currency obligations on a conservative basis, the company has changed its practice so that such obligations are now translated to U.S. dollars on the basis of current rather than historical exchange rates. The effect of this change was to recognize in 1972 exchange losses of $6.7 million. After taking into consideration the related income tax effect of $1.5 million, net income per common share was reduced by 24¢. Results reported for prior years would not have been materially affected by earlier adoption of this translation practice.

Effective in 1971, the company adopted the policy of capitalizing as a property cost the applicable interest costs incurred during the construction periods of major operating facilities. The net effect of this change was to increase income before extraordinary items in 1972 by $2.7 million (12¢ per share) and in 1971 by $8.8 million (4¢ per share). The interest capitalized related primarily to the new aluminum reduction plant being built in Sebree, Kentucky.

EXTRAORDINARY ITEMS

The extraordinary items included in the Statement of Consolidated Income comprise the following:

	1972	1971
Net gain on sale of assets of forest products division	$80,136
Provision for exchange losses on foreign currency loans	5,218

During 1972, the company sold the principal assets, primary timberlands, of its Forest Products division in Montana to Champion International Corporation for $117 million. Included in the basic sales price was the assumption by the purchaser of certain obligations relating to the assets sold, including the unliquidated balance of a $15 million timber production payment sold in 1971. The gain realized from the sale has been reduced by personnel and other costs relating to the curtailment of the division's operations, including local taxes and a $12.6 mil-

ANACONDA 1971 10-K REPORT TO THE SEC FOREST PRODUCTS

The Registrant owns more than a half-million acres of timberlands in western Montana, where it carries on an extensive lumbering operation, and operates a sawmill, planing and specialty manufacturing plant at Bonner, Montana. Total production during 1971 was 117 million board feet.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Place admits that under his direction Anaconda sold a major asset and used the proceeds to pay off the balance of the revolving credit loan rather than devote the money to operations. The transaction is more fully described in exhibits H and I. Although Mr. Place states that the forest products operation was not a principal line of business, the company's 1971 10K annual report filed with the SEC describes it as an "extensive lumbering operation." (See exhibit J.)

In 1968, Anaconda refinanced its revolving credit loan with a $150 million sale of debentures rather than a sale of assets. Perhaps another, more favorable, method of financing could have been arranged during the years before the bank loan matured.

Much of Anaconda's recent financing has taken the form of leases backed by the company's guarantee of the underlying loans. The Sebree aluminum plant and Montana pollution control bonds are examples. This has the effect of reducing the amount of debt directly shown on Anaconda's balance sheet.

The banks did not request or choose to have our loans repaid. They would have preferred a continuance of credit to a sound credit risk company like Anaconda because banks generate their income by interest on loans. You state, the major New York banks have not given Anaconda a major extension of credit since being paid off in July, 1972. The point is we haven't needed or asked for major bank credit since July, 1972. We have open and unused credit lines and you can be sure that bank credit is available to us as we need it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD exhibits K and L.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXHIBIT K

1971 ANNUAL REPORT CORPORATE FINANCING

During 1971, the company successfully extended its near-term debt maturities through revisions to its major revolving credit agreement, which is presently being renegotiated to provide for still greater flexibility in the administration of financial planning. Revisions to the revolving credit, new financing agreements negotiated during the year covering equipment loans and the extension of Eurodollar revolving credits, and other changes in long-term debt are described in Note E to the financial statements. Financing is now being negotiated to provide funds for the Sebree aluminum reduction plant and for pollution-control facilities at the Anaconda smelter, the only major scheduled projects not fully financed.

EXHIBIT L

ANACONDA 1972 ANNUAL REPORT INSURANCE CLAIMS FOR RECOVERY OF CHILEAN EXPROPRIATION LOSSES

Included in the Consolidated Balance Sheet at December 31, 1971 were the total claims filed against Overseas Private Investment Corporation (OPIC) under the contracts of guaranty insuring certain investments of the company in Chile.

In September 1972, the company received from OPIC $11.9 million, the amount claimed as compensation for the expropriation of its investments relating to the Exotica copper property. At the same time OPIC formally rejected the balance of the claims for compensation for Anaconda's expropriated Chuquibambilla and El Salvador properties. The company continues to believe that it is entitled to payment of the rejected claims and the matter is being submitted to binding arbitration, as provided in the contracts of guaranty.

FOREIGN INVESTMENTS AND MINING JOINT VENTURES

Foreign affiliated companies in which Anaconda has significant investments are located principally in Mexico and Brazil. The carrying value of these investments as listed on page 15, Schedule A, was $42.3 million at the end of 1972 and $36.7 million in 1971.

Anaconda's equity in the net earnings of companies operating in Mexico and Brazil amounted to $5.5 million in 1972 and $5.4 million in 1971.

A consolidated subsidiary's interest in a Jamaican alumina joint venture was $33.5 million at December 31, 1972 and $34.4 million at the end of 1971.

UNITED STATES AND FOREIGN INCOME TAXES

The provision for income taxes in 1972 includes foreign deferred taxes of $1.0 million (negligible in 1971) and a $3 million charge equivalent to the benefit from utilization of the expropriation loss carryforward.

The remaining portion of the ten-year consolidated tax loss carryforward as of December 31, 1972, resulting from the expropriation loss claimed on the company's 1971 return, is presently estimated at $315 million (exclusive of any amounts relating to the contracts of guaranty with OPIC). The amount of the loss carryforward is subject to audit by the Internal Revenue Service.

The company has unused United States investment tax credits amounting to approximately $18.1 million, the major portion of which will be available through 1978. For financial accounting purposes, the portion thereof recognized as a reduction of the charge in lieu of income taxes in 1972 amounted to $15.1 million, including $13.5 million allocated to the extraordinary gain from the sale of Forest Products division assets. Accordingly, at December 31, 1972 unused investment tax credits determined on a financial accounting basis approximated $3 million.

LONG-TERM DEBT

Amounts payable on long-term debt outstanding at December 31, 1972 during the next five years are (in millions) as follows: 1973, $21.3; 1974, $18.7; 1975, $11.8; 1976, $43.4; 1977, $0.8. The debentures are to be redeemed through annual sinking fund payments of not less than $9.25 million or more than $18.5 million principal amount, beginning in 1978.

In connection with a $110.8 million financing program relating to the construction of a 120,000 ton per year aluminum reduction plant at Sebree, Kentucky, the company issued $28 million of 8½% notes payable 1979-1992, in July 1972. These note agreements restrict the company in the payment of dividends and, in certain respects, in its ability to incur additional long-term debt. As a result, at December 31, 1972, $61.2 million of retained earnings were available for the payment of dividends and $155.1 million of additional long-term debt could be incurred without restrictions.

The company's indebtedness of $110 million at December 31, 1971 under a revolving credit agreement with a group of banks was repaid during 1972 and the agreement terminated. Eurodollar loans aggregating $25 million were also repaid during the year and the related lending commitments were reduced from $80 to $40 million.

Mr. METCALF. Banks generate income from interest on loans, but they are also vitally concerned about the safety of the principal amount outstanding.

On page 18 of the 1971 annual report, Anaconda stated that it was renegotiating its major revolving credit agreement to provide for "still greater flexibility in the administration of financial planning." Page 20 of the 1972 annual report shows that the result was the repayment of $110 million in the first 7 months of 1972 and the termination of the revolving credit agreement on July 31, 1972. Negotiating such an arrangement should not be too difficult. See exhibits K and L.

The concern in the Metzenbaum bill statement was over creditor-debtor relations during Anaconda's period of adversity. It is immaterial whether major lenders would now be willing to extend credit to a revived, healthy company.

Note on exhibit L that the $28 million issue of notes in July 1972 contains certain restrictions on the payment of dividends and the ability to incur additional long-term debt.

Again, I quote from Mr. Place's letter: You state that, "shareholders generally have no right to redeem their stock with a corporation and thus remove their capital from the use of the corporation, especially when adversity arises and the company needs all of its financial resources. Influential creditors, however, can reclaim their capital at the very time when it is most needed." That quotation reflects a basic misconception of the nature of equity capital as compared to debt. Shareholders are the owners and so long as they retain their shares (which, incidentally, they can sell at any time), they share the risks and the rewards of the business. Lenders have the right of repayment of principal plus interest and usually do not share in the profits of the business. Of necessity, creditors have priority over shareholders. This does not, however, mean that the creditors have operational control of the business. The relationship of shareholders and creditors is not a matter of priorities but a matter of completely different positions.

Mr. Place has misunderstood the point of the Metzenbaum bill statement. The levers of debt control discussed in that statement are not confined to the legal priority of creditors over shareholders or their right to repayment of principal at the time of maturity. Other levers of control include direct participation on the debtor's board, the influence to accomplish the prepayment of principal, and the myriad of contractual restrictions on corporate activities which large lenders may extract in return for credit. Short-term lenders have great influence deriving from the type of credit they provide. To finance inventory over the next 6 months, $2 million can be more crucial to the continuance of corporate operations than $50 million in long-term credit. Long-term institutional lenders have current influence because they may be sought as a credit source for new long-term debt issues in addition to the ones they presently hold. This influence is increasing as institutional lending power becomes more concentrated through mergers, loan consortiums, and correspondent bank relationships.

Mr. Place's comment on the ability of shareholders to sell their stock also misses the issue. Once issued, the sale of stock in the secondary market by a shareholder to someone else does not affect the capital account of a corporation. The corporation still has the use of the amount of capital for which the share was originally sold. Selling stock to someone else and redeeming stock with the corporation are entirely different matters. In contrast, the very nature of debt is the temporary infusion of capital into a corporation. Thus, levers of debt control directly relate to the effects of removing capital from a going business. The power to grant or withhold credit is indeed a mighty lever of control, and corporate managements are well aware of its importance.

TRIBUTE TO CHET HOLIFIELD ON HIS RETIREMENT

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ROONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, during my long career here in the House of Representatives, it has been my great pleasure and honor to have known and worked with stalwarts of the highest caliber and competence. Men of foresight and vision who held what was best for our country above everything else. Such a man is my good and longtime friend from California, the Honorable CHET HOLIFIELD.

For the past 32 years the people of the 19th Congressional District of California have had the good sense and good fortune to have had CHET as their Representative in Congress. His courage, insight, and knowledge of many of the most complex problems made him a most valuable Member of the House.

Most certainly CHET HOLIFIELD always typified the best in politics. He is an honest, courageous man, and a decent and hardworking Congressman.

Mr. Speaker, I would indeed be remiss if I did not at this time extend a word of praise to CHET's lovely wife Vernice for her many important and valuable contributions to CHET's success over the many years.

I am confident that I bespeak the thoughts of all the Members of this Congress when I say that we are going to miss CHET and Vernice—also called Cam—very, very much. Even though Mrs. Rooney and I are also retiring from the House of Representatives and has continuing our longstanding friendship with CHET and Vernice. In the meantime, Mrs. Rooney joins me in wishing the Holifields a long, healthy, and peaceful retirement for a great many years to come.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR MARLOW COOK

HON. LAWTON CHILES

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, it is with considerable sorrow that I offer these words of tribute to Senator MARLOW COOK as he leaves the Senate, for in the past several years I have come to know him with great respect and affection. I will very much miss him and his wonderful wife, Nancy.

On arriving in the Senate in 1971, I first came to know MARLOW COOK for his kindness, guidance, and cooperation. Since then, I have had the opportunity to broaden my knowledge and understanding of the man and the Senator, and I have great admiration and respect for his abilities, his conviction, his conscience, and his dedication to the well-being of his State and our Nation.

Senator COOK has devoted the past 17 years to public life and service, performing outstandingly in his home State of Kentucky prior to being elected to the Senate 6 years ago.

While in the Senate, he has served as ranking minority member on the Commerce Committee's Subcommittees on Consumer and Environment, ranking minority member on the Committee on Rules and Administration, and ranking minority member of the Judiciary Committee's subcommittees dealing with juvenile delinquency, national penitentiaries, and citizen interests, among others.

He left his mark on legislation involving product safety standards, automobile insurance reform, consumer protection, and major transportation issues, including Amtrak. He played an important role in the confirmation of both Gerald Ford and NELSON ROCKEFELLER as Vice Presidents. In all his assignments and on the floor of the Senate we have all benefited from his good counsel, courtesy, and good humor.

I salute him, I thank him, and I wish him the best of success in the future.

HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS

HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that our beloved colleague LES ARENDS has served as whip of his party longer than any other man in history. He has been "Mr. Republican" in the House, we are looking forward to rendered to the Nation and to the Congress unsurpassed dedicated service. His parliamentary skill and his understanding of the legislative process have contributed tremendously to the legislative history of the past 40 years. No one has worked more diligently or more effectively for a strong America and for national defense. LES has always represented the position of his party with vigor, statesmanship, and with overriding concern for the national interest. His friends and admirers are on both sides of the aisle, and are throughout Washington, the Nation, and indeed the world.

December 20, 1974

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to count LES ARENDS among my personal friends and I wish for him and the lovely Mrs. Arends every happiness and the best always.

PETER DOMINICK BROUGHT LOGIC AND BALANCE IN HIS SENATE SERVICE

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, as the Senate counts the array of faces which newly grace the Senate, and as we remember those whose careers in this body have so recently ended, I add to those of others my fond farewell to PETER DOMINICK.

I have had an opportunity to know the Senator from Colorado in our common membership on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. He was a vigorous and active member on it since he was assigned to the committee in 1965.

PETER DOMINICK has made an enduring impression. As ranking minority member of the Education Subcommittee and as an active participant in the development of health legislation, PETE has been recognized as a man of logic, reason, and even temperament. He frequently provided balance and alternative viewpoints in the consideration of legislation, and he was keenly interested in the panoply of social and human needs addressed by our full committee.

I shall miss PETER DOMINICK in the Senate. Mary and I offer him and his lovely wife, Nancy, our best wishes for a happy future.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR HENRY M. JACKSON, LONDON, NOVEMBER 11, 1974

HON. JOHN BRADEMAs

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. BRADEMAs. Mr. Speaker, I believe Members of the House will read with great interest the address of the distinguished Senator from Washington, the Honorable HENRY M. JACKSON, delivered on November 11, 1974, in London to the Pilgrims of Great Britain.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

I insert the text of Senator JACKSON's address at this point in the RECORD:

TO THE PILGRIMS OF GREAT BRITAIN

(By Senator HENRY M. JACKSON)

Americans invariably do two things when they are in London; they visit Westminster Abbey and—if they do any speechmaking—they quote Churchill. Having been to Westminster Abbey let me recall Churchill's words at a Pilgrims dinner in July 1932. He said: "Our troubles are by no means ended. The economic crisis, the monetary crisis in which the world is gripped, still holds its full intensity. Baffling problems confront the Statesmen and afflict the peoples of both our countries, but I believe there is one grand, valiant conviction shared on both sides of the Atlantic. It is this: together, there is no problem we cannot solve."

My remarks tonight are directed to this central theme—that together there is no problem we cannot solve—but with this addition: apart, we will find neither solutions nor sanctuary from our common perils.

When the Pilgrims gathered a year ago to hear Secretary of State Kissinger, the Western Alliance, darkened by the embargo of Middle Eastern oil, was still reeling from the trauma of the Yom Kippur War. The Atlantic Alliance, having assembled itself on the parade ground of common purpose, proceeded to march off in as many directions as there were marchers.

However great the historical and cultural affinity of our two peoples, however richly we, on both sides of the Atlantic, share in the tradition of Western civilization, it has become painfully clear that a dangerous fragmentation has impaired our capacity to act in concert, diffusing our common strength and defeating our common cause.

There has been growing concern in the United States that the foreign policies of some European countries evidence lack of faith in cooperative action. On the other hand, the foreign policy of the United States, while certainly no worse, has often been no better than many European foreign policies in that regard. Too often, for example, my government managed greater forbearance in dealing with its adversaries than in working with its allies. On occasion we asked for your support without disclosing the facts as we knew them; or we asked you to share our risks when we were unwilling to share our reasons or our resources. My government has been slow to appreciate and to grapple with the common economic dangers. On both sides of the Atlantic this much is certain: the divisions that were inefficient in the Year of Europe have become, in this year of crisis, inexcusable.

OUR COMMON ECONOMIC PERIL

The economic stability of the Atlantic community is more precarious today than at any time since the Second World War. Our economies are seized by unprecedented rates of inflation coupled with economic stagnation and decline. The gross national product of OECD countries will grow at only 1.3% this year. Meanwhile, the index of international prices has risen at an annual rate of nearly 10% in the past five years; and 14% in 1974 alone. Unemployment and interest rates are up. Standards of living are down and falling. Economic growth has all but ceased.

Today even nations are in danger of default. The Eurocurrency market, on which governments as well as businesses have come to depend, cannot alone provide the necessary financing for deficit-ridden oil-consuming nations. The world's financial system is endangered by the spectacular growth of short-term bank borrowing, with the proceeds tied up in long-term loans—some of which may never be repaid. Bank losses and bank failures have reached alarming levels, prompting major concern on the part of central bankers everywhere. The outlook ahead is even more disturbing. It is estimated that in the next three months as many petrodollars will inundate private money markets as have flowed in during the last nine months.

We have witnessed a rapid and unprecedented transfer of monetary reserves. The International Monetary Fund reports that monetary reserves held by oil-producing nations have jumped from $13 billion to $38 billion in the last year. The oil producers now have monetary reserves equalling the combined reserves of industrial Europe in 1970.

These bleak indicators—and there are many others—confront us in a period of increased financial, as well as economic, interdependence. Inflation and recession, acknowledging no national boundaries, spread a disease which cannot be easily quarantined.

THE PRICE OF OIL AND ECONOMIC POLICY

No matter what remedy a single nation adopts, decisions made far from her borders limit both options and opportunities.

It is the price of oil that has dimmed not only our lights, but also our hopes for a measured and orderly economic recovery. Oil-consuming nations will collectively bear a staggering current account deficit this year in excess of $50 billion. The quadrupling of the price of oil is a problem not only for Europe, Japan and the United States: if our economies have been crippled by the fourfold increase in world oil prices, those of the developing nations have been strangled. The cost of oil imports to these nations has increased by nearly $10 billion in less than a year. This increase entirely offsets the amount of official development assistance these countries now receive. Consequently, those least able to finance rising oil costs have been forced to curtail desperately needed human and resource development programs.

The direct relationship between the price of oil and the price of fertilizer dramatically illustrates the immediate crisis confronting the third world. The aggregate "fertilizer bill" for developing countries has increased fourfold in only two years; yet even at exorbitant prices, fertilizer is in critically short supply. Mass starvation is no longer a distant threat, but a grim fact for many of these countries.

In the developed nations of the West, the acute shortage of oil and the arbitrary price increases brought on by last year's embargo have given way to a mounting financial crisis. We lack both adequate theories and appropriate mechanisms—to say nothing of the self-interested cooperation of the producing states—in dealing with the complex problems facing the world. For example, surplus revenues accruing to the producing states are expected to reach $60 to $70 billion by the end of this year, $170 billion by the end of 1975. The World Bank estimates that OPEC surpluses will amount to $650 billion by 1980, and an incomprehensible $1.2 trillion by 1985—surely the largest and most precipitous shift in wealth the world has ever seen.

A SPECIAL MINISTERIAL COUNCIL

The nations of the Atlantic community have waited too long to respond to this "gathering storm." Thus far in dealing with the oil-producing states my country has alternately cajoled and blustered without effect. Instead of expecting the producer nations to solve our financial and economic problems—not all of which were created by escalating oil prices—it is time that the consumer nations did something for themselves.

I believe we must join together in an international effort with the urgency, confidence and intelligence that, in an earlier crisis, accompanied and sustained the Marshall Plan for the postwar reconstruction of Europe. The oil-consuming nations of Europe, along with our friends in Japan and elsewhere, must hammer out a cohesive economic and financial strategy capable of promoting their interests, and the world's interest, in realistic oil prices and a stable world economy.

I propose the establishment of a Special Council of Economic and Financial Ministers—initially comprised of the oil-consuming nations—to devise and implement a new strategy for economic survival. This ministerial-level council should be constituted so that it can respond effectively and realistically to the hazards and opportunities ahead. Much of the administrative machinery to support this effort—the OECD, the Energy Working Group and other multilateral and international organizations—already exists. It is the absence not of institutions, but of meaningful initiatives and coordinated leadership, that impedes our progress and clouds our future.

A COMMON AGENDA

I offer the following agenda for the Special Council of Economic and Financial Ministers.

First: The paramount and immediate objective is to develop and coordinate efforts to bring world oil prices down to levels that will give all nations a fighting chance to contain inflation, to preserve the world economy, and to maintain the international financial system.

An essential step is to insulate the price of oil produced by consuming nations from the control of the producers cartel. The present policy of allowing the cartel arbitrarily to establish price levels for all oil—not just the oil they produce and export—should not be legitimized by the inaction of the United States and other consuming nations which are also important oil producers.

Second: We must develop the capacity to withstand curtailment in our sources of imported oil. We have made an important start in the Energy Working Group and in the negotiation of arrangements for burden-sharing and cooperative action in meeting emergency supply situations.

When the American Congress reconvenes a week from today, I will seek early approval in the Senate of legislation to implement the major features of this agreement.

Third: Essential to any overall plan to bring down the price of oil is a tough program to limit demand through mandatory energy conservation. All consuming nations need to fashion comprehensive and concerted plans to limit consumption by eliminating waste while maintaining economic viability. The establishment of dollar or volume limits on oil imports is one initiative that deserves serious consideration. France has endorsed such a program; I have urged a similar "peril point" concept for my own country.

Fourth: Bringing down the price of oil will require an immediate no-nonsense, expansion in the development of the existing and potential energy sources of consuming nations. This means the rapid development of my nation's Outer Continental Shelf, our Alaska fields, and our Naval Petroleum Reserves. It also requires that you and the Norwegians get on with the development of the North Sea fields—without delay. And it means increased efforts by our allies in Canada and elsewhere to exploit their own rich potential.

For the longer term, we must make a massive and cost-effective investment in research and development that will lead to new technologies both for developing new energy sources and for lowering the environmental and other costs of extracting conventional energy sources. In this task, we need to mobilize our abundant intellectual talents, as well as our combined capital resources.

Fifth: Each of our countries must get on with the job of setting its own economic affairs in order. In this effort, the Special Council can be a regular forum for the exchange of plans for stabilizing our respective economies.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

December 20, 1974

For example, the renewed interest in public investment institutions to stimulate sluggish productivity merits wider consideration. Canada has already chartered a national investment corporation; your government is likewise considering proposals to infuse new government capital into depressed sectors. We can and must prevent domestic commercial failures from precipitating an international economic collapse.

Whatever our differing interests, we must not resort to the destructive "beggar-thy-neighbor" policies of the 1930's. Attempts to shift disquieting trade deficits from one country to another—whether through import barriers or currency devaluation—can only bring on worldwide depression. We must promote an orderly economic recovery for the benefit of the whole family of nations.

Sixth: Restoring health to our financial institutions is an urgent objective in the months ahead. The orderly evolution of Euromarkets will require concerted action on the part of central bankers in several areas: more reliable information on the market's operations; the development of liquidity standards to bolster confidence in its institutions; and continued cooperation toward establishing some international "lender of last resort."

Seventh: There is a compelling need for new policies to promote stable, safe and diversified investment of oil producer funds. To dispel present uncertainty we must devise uniform guidelines which will apply to investments by the producing states in our respective national economies. These guidelines must provide consuming nations with the assurance of continued control over their own essential financial infrastructures, and, at the same time, recognize the legitimate concerns of producing nations in guarding against the real risks of inflation and currency fluctuations.

Eighth: The Special Council must explore means of assisting those nations facing serious liquidity problems as a result of concentrated oil producer investment in a handful of countries and markets. A major effort—preferably international, but if necessary on a more limited basis—must be made to encourage direct investment in the economies of those nations which are increasingly threatened by their inability to attract funds in private markets.

Ninth: We cannot overlook the plight of the developing countries. The international dialogue now underway in Rome on the critical issue of food is a first step; rapid implementation of cooperative projects to prevent famine and restore hope must be the next.

Joint efforts to build fertilizer plants in the Persian Gulf deserve careful consideration. The producing nations could commit natural gas—which is now being flared and wasted—as the feed-stock. Industrialized nations could commit the necessary manpower, technology and equipment.

Tenth: We should initiate a review of the changing role of the multinational corporation, especially the international oil companies, and prepare standards of conduct which will prevent private gain at public expense, promote orderly world commerce, and better identify the appropriate regulatory spheres of the respective countries in which these corporations are based and operate.

The initiatives presented in this agenda are made in the tradition of bipartisan foreign policy which my nation has historically observed and to which I personally subscribe.

Throughout all aspects of our cooperative endeavor, we need to maintain a continuing dialogue with oil-producing nations and less-developed countries on the critical issues of fuel, finance, and food. The goal of this dialogue should be a new set of arrangements which merit mutual support. In ef-orts to accommodate conflicting views, however, we will not submit to the dictates of any group of nations which threaten the security of individual countries, or undermine the stability of the international financial system and the world economy.

The oil-producing nations cannot achieve their own varied objectives without the cooperation and assistance of the major consuming nations. This gives us both leverage and opportunity to influence the policies and conduct of the oil producers if we choose to do so—and if we act together.

The agenda I have proposed—our common agenda—offers us the opportunity to promote the economic well-being of all peoples. Let us not succumb to the paralysis of pessimism. Let us use our combined assets and ingenuity to shape a future in which all nations may flourish.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, let me add these words: There is, above all, one abiding faith that joins our two peoples. It is the commitment to individual liberty that time and time again has brought us together in the cause of human rights.

Freedom imposes great obligations on those fortunate enough to have it.

If we care only for ourselves, what are we? If we do not speak for freedom, who will? And if not now, when?

If new relations between East and West are to mature into long-term peaceful cooperation, there must be progress toward the freer movement of people and ideas across international borders. In Geneva, at the European Security Conference, your government and mine must join together, along with the free nations of Europe, to press for lowering the artificial barriers that now divide East and West. In this enterprise we, together, are privileged to represent what is most noble in our traditions.

Having begun with our Winston Churchill, I shall close with our Harry Truman. I believe that both men would have approved. On November 11, 1949, twenty-five years ago today, President Truman had this to say:

"The task of achieving greater justice and freedom will be long and it will be difficult. In various parts of the world today, human rights and freedom are being deliberately violated and suppressed. These threats are not only morally wrong—they threaten to undo the slow and hard-won achievements of civilization. There can be no higher challenge than to build a world of freedom and justice, a world in which all men are brothers. That is the goal toward which we must strive with all our strength."

In 1945 a truck driver named Bevin entrusted the security of Europe to a haberdasher named Truman with the words, "Over to you." Now, nearly thirty years later, the watchword among Pilgrims must be: over to us.

RETIREMENT OF HERALD STRINGER AS NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE DIRECTOR, THE AMERICAN LEGION

HON. STROM THURMOND

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, on December 31, 1974, Herald Stringer will retire as the National Legislative Director of the American Legion. I want to take this opportunity to commend him for a job well done during his 10-year service in this important position.

December 20, 1974

When Mr. Stringer was named to this difficult job on January 1, 1965, he came to that office with an excellent background to serve the veterans of America. He had been the department commander for the State of Alaska in 1951, and the national executive committeeman from that State for 9 years. As an attorney and a former State legislator, he had been involved in the governmental process for many years.

Mr. President, he has held many positions of confidence and brought great honor to the Legion and to the Nation. A native of Arkansas, he is a great American patriot, and an outstanding leader in the field of veterans' affairs.

Although he is retiring from his official position as national legislative director of the American Legion, he will continue to be a strong and respected spokesman for our veterans. He has fulfilled well the trust reposed in him.

I deeply appreciate the great dedication and ability with which he has worked with me and other Members of both the Senate and House on veterans matters.

Mr. President, as Herald Stringer relinquishes his official duties with the Legion, I shall continue to hold him in the highest esteem, and wish him and his family every success in their future endeavors.

HON. H. R. GROSS

HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, may I take this opportunity to wish every happiness and all life's blessings to our colleague H. R. Gross. His perseverance and his dedication to principle are a standard that could well be emulated in the years to come. There is no way to calculate the number of unwise expenditures the Nation has been spared as a result of his keen eye and his attention to every parliamentary detail. One could perhaps disagree with Congressman Gross on specifics and yet still appreciate tremendously his commitment to fiscal stability and his tireless vigilance on the floor of the House of Representatives. Without H. R. Gross the House of Representatives will truly never be the same.

DR. FLOYD M. RIDDICK

HON. ROMAN L. HRUSKA

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, after nearly 30 years of Senate service, Dr. Floyd M. Riddick, the Parliamentarian of the U.S. Senate, will retire at the close of the 93d Congress.

I want to take this opportunity to pay tribute to Dr. Riddick for his long and distinguished service. Few men have worked more diligently and conscientiously in a position that demands fairness and patience. We have all benefited by his wisdom and foresight in approaching the daily business of this body.

The Senate is particularly indebted to Dr. Riddick for the volume entitled "Senate Procedure" which he first coauthored with Mr. Charles L. Watkins in 1958 and revised in 1964. Earlier this year Dr. Riddick published a new volume of "Senate Procedure."

I am very pleased to learn that Dr. Riddick has agreed to continue to serve the Senate as a consultant and as Parliamentarian emeritus.

I wish him many happy years in retirement.

TRIBUTE TO THE HONORABLE FRANK ALBERT STUBBLEFIELD

HON. JAMIE L. WHITTEN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 18, 1974

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with my colleagues in paying tribute to the outstanding services of my friend and colleague FRANK ALBERT STUBBLEFIELD. It is with regret we see this dedicated Member of long standing with 16 years service representing Kentucky's First District, leaving the Congress.

As a member of the Agriculture Committee and chairman of its Subcommittee on Tobacco, FRANK STUBBLEFIELD has made a great contribution not only to his beloved district and State, but to the entire Nation, and his service will long be remembered. His knowledge and understanding, along with a sense of balance and great efforts in behalf of agriculture and the problems of rural areas serve as an exemplary guide. It would certainly behoove those of us in future Congresses to keep in mind the efforts, wisdom, and record of FRANK STUBBLEFIELD as we face local, national, and world problems. He shall be missed in the position that he filled so ably.

I join my colleagues in wishing FRANK and Odessa the very best for many active and happy years.

MONTANA'S COUNTIES

HON. LEE METCALF

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, today, as never before, Montana's counties are on the move. Montana's 1972 constitution requires a review of the operations and development of recommendations for change for Montana's local government. With the help of the resources available through the Intergovernmental Personnel Act of 1970, Montana's counties are meeting this mandate.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article on Montana's counties which recently appeared in the National Association of Counties' newspaper, County News, be printed at this point in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

MONTANA REEXAMINES FORM OF GOVERNMENT

The spirit of peaceful revolution is alive in Montana as study commissions in all 56 counties begin work on a study of each county's structure and services.

Montana's 1972 constitution is the only one in the nation which requires each county (and each city) to elect study commissions every 10 years beginning in 1974 for the purpose of submitting a plan of government to the voters.

These 56 county studies present a real opportunity for citizen involvement in local government. They also present a challenge to county and state officials who must try to help the commissions in their work.

Montana Assn. of Counties Director Dean Zinnecker assigned IPA Project Director Ed Mares to organize a two-day workshop for all study commission members, including city commissions.

The purpose of the workshop, held two weeks after the commission elections in November 1974, in conjunction with the Montana Commission on Local Government, was the proposed state implementing legislation for the 1972 constitution's local government article, and to provide an overview of the different forms of government around the nation.

Starting off the two-day session, state commission Deputy Director Richard Reese noted that the study commission's most valuable resources are the county and city officials themselves, because "it is they, after all, who have had to work under the limitations of scarce resources, the pressure of great demands, and with inadequate government structures and powers."

Panels during the rest of the workshop left most of the time open for questions from the study commissioners. Panel participants discussing "problem areas in county government" were Montana County Commissioners Ray Stoner, Sheridan; Lud Broman, Missoula; Joe DeLong, Flathead; Walt Sales, Gallatin; and Missoula Administrator Chuck Painter.

Leading discussion on forms of government were Orange County (N.Y.) Executive Louis V. Mills, Rock County (Wisc.) Administrator Larry Brown and Richard Reese of the State Commission on Local Government. NACo staff members Florence Zeller and Terry Schutten answered questions on forms of government in other parts of the country.

Counties in Montana may choose from the alternative forms outlined by the proposed state legislation, but can also write a charter providing (within certain broad mandates) for any form of government they choose.

Such a charter county would have more "home rule" authority than counties which opt for simply a structural change through one of the alternative forms. Mike Sehesedt, from the Montana Commission on Local Government, answered questions about this alternative.

From the state's Bureau of Government Research at the University of Montana, Dr. James Lopach discussed city-county consolidation and the concept of confederation. At the end of the program, Dr. Lopach noted that the local government review process was really the "spirit of 1976" and that the enthusiasm with which the study commissioners were beginning their work reflects this spirit. Hal Stearns, director of the Montana Bicentennial Administration, outlined the state's Bicentennial programs and urged participants to tie their review process to celebration of our country's birth.

MICHAEL FROME: ENVIRONMENTALIST

HON. KEN HECHLER

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. HECHLER of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the firing of Michael Frome, the noted environmental writer for Field & Stream magazine, by CBS is a sad chapter in recent history, reflecting hysteria against those who fight to protect planet Earth. Mike Frome is a straight shooter who staunchly defends the environment against the many forces working to exploit it. His dismissal is a classic example of how some people will cave in to political pressure from the big energy lobbies.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to include in the RECORD several articles concerning the firing of Mike Frome:

[From Time magazine, Nov. 4, 1974]

THIS SPORTING LIFE

Field and Stream (circ. 1,860,000), a monthly devoted to duck hunting, fishing and other woodsy pursuits, hardly seems like a cockpit of ideological controversy. Yet in recent weeks its owner, the Columbia Broadcasting System, has been the target of angry letters and calls from the environmental and conservation lobbies. Some of the protests came from members of Congress, including Henry Reuss, chairman of the House Subcommittee on Conservation and Natural Resources. Then 50 irate conservationists waved placards in front of CBS's Washington office. Cause of the wrath: the firing of Field & Stream's widely known conservation writer, Michael Frome.

Frome, 64, is a successful lecturer, magazine writer and author (Rand McNally National Park Guide), whose Stream columns have crusaded for preservation of wilderness areas since 1968.

This fall, Editor Jack Samson canceled the column, ostensibly because the magazine wanted a "modification in the editorial approach." Says he: "I've already hired someone else with an even more strident and stronger stand on conservation. I just don't think Mike Frome did a very good job." CBS officials say that they knew nothing of the change until Frome's supporters started to sound off, and that the parent company bore the writer no grudge.

Frome and some of his partisans insist that Stream's waters are murkier than that. Frome claims that after Samson was made editor in 1972, he was told not to "name names." Frome says that Samson, for example, refused to publish his criticism of John McGuire, chief of the Forest Service. Frome insists: "They want to play it safe and steady."

Irate Congressmen: Instead, Frome preferred to play it tough and tendentious. He criticized timber companies, highway builders and strip miners. Frequently he used his column to lobby against legislation that might be potentially destructive to the environment. One of his notable victories came in 1970, when he helped defeat a bill which would have given timber cutting priority over recreational and other uses for national forests.

Says Joseph Browder, director of the Environmental Policy Center in Washington: "Frome has raised the consciousness of millions of readers from bag limits and such to the real questions of what's happening to our resources and what can be done to protect them."

In the consciousness-raising process, Frome has made enemies in big business, the gun lobby and on Capitol Hill. Many Congressmen were irate about his controversial 1972 "Rate Your Candidate" article. The story evaluated Senate and Congressmen on their attitudes toward conservation and environment issues. Says Congressman Reuss: "If Field & Stream has no place for Frome, then we have come to a time when the voice of conservation is, quite literally, a voice crying in the wilderness."

[From the Roanoke Times, Nov. 5, 1974]
FIRING OF CONSERVATIONIST WRITER IS DISPUTED

(By Bill Cochran)

Someone once asked Michael Frome, the widely-read crusading conservation columnist of Field & Stream Magazine: "Why don't you stick to hunting and fishing? Leave the politics to experts."

Replied Frome, "I wish I could. But without effective political action now, the hunting and fishing is apt to be mighty slim, or nonexistent, a generation hence."

Now Field & Stream apparently has asked Frome much the same question. Although not many of his faithful readers know it, since his column is in the November issue of the magazine, Frome has been fired.

Already, the wrath of this action is coming down on the magazine and its owner, the Columbia Broadcasting System. It's anyone's guess what will happen once the word really gets out.

Frome, a 64-year-old Virginian, has thrived on controversy, because he's not known to back down or soften his punches against those he views as a threat to conservation, be they road builders, strip miners, dam constructors, foresters, polluters, politicians or even the President of the United States.

From the nearly two-million circulation of Field & Stream, he gained his largest platform and rapidly grew to become a widely respected—and hated—conservation writer, at a time when similar magazines seldom informed readers of more than how to hook 'em and bag 'em.

Field & Stream lost some of its manhood when it fired Mike Frome.

Why the firing?

Time Magazine—imagine this—devotes two columns to the matter in its current issue. It quotes Jack Samson, Field & Stream editor, as saying he wanted a "modification in the editorial approach."

Said Samson, "I just didn't think Mike Frome did a very good job."

But Time implies, and many must agree, that the matter runs deeper than this. Frome, in his consciousness-raising process, had made countless enemies, from big business to Capitol Hill.

He started his Field & Stream column in 1968, when Clare Conley was editor, Conley, a couple years ago, moved on when he left the management, namely publisher Michael J. O'Neill, was looking too closely over his shoulder.

For Frome, being fired isn't exactly a new experience. When his writings got too rich for the American Forest Magazine, the mouthpiece of the American Forestry Association, he was fired from that publication, after a six year association as columnist. The issue, largely, was his opposition to clear cutting forestry practices.

As it turned out, this attempt to gag Frome did more to publicize his stand than anything else could have. It will be surprising if the same thing doesn't happen in the wake of the Field & Stream firing.

Shortly after his dismissal from the American Forest Magazine, Frome spoke at Dabney S. Lancaster College in Clifton Forge. Earlier, William E. Towell, executive vice president of the American Forestry Association, had stated that Frome's column was terminated, "only because he became personal and abusive."

Frome, a small, soft-spoken gentleman, stood before the Dabney Lancaster group and said, "Now I ask you, do I look like anybody personal and abusive?"

But like many good writers, he looked one way and wrote another. It is something that has gotten him into trouble, but a conservationist in trouble isn't exactly anything new.

[From the Vancouver (Wash.) Columbian, Nov. 7, 1974]

WHY WRITER MIKE FROME WAS FIRED

(By Jeff Stansbury and Edward Flattau)

Readers of Field & Stream know Mike Frome is one of the ablest conservationists who ever wore out a typewriter. He joined the magazine in 1968, served as its conservation editor for six years, waged a literate war on the despoilers of wild lands and brought Field & Stream rare distinction. Last month Frome was fired.

We asked the magazine's editor, Jack Samson, why he had let Frome go. "We don't wash our linen in public," he said. "It was strictly an editorial decision."

A dozen national environmental groups disagree. So do Reps. Guy Vander Jagt, R-Mich., John Dingell, D-Mich., and Henry Reuss, D-Wis. All have criticized Frome's firing. Most of them consider it a politically motivated act—and they have aimed their protest not only at Samson but at the communications conglomerate, CBS.

Field & Stream was bought by CBS shortly before it hired Frome. The network owns five other magazines, numerous radio and TV stations and nonmedia subsidiaries. It grosses $1.5 billion a year and for a long time scarcely seemed to notice Field & Stream. "We saw almost nothing of CBS in the early years," says Clare Conley, who preceded Samson as editor. Several developments in 1972 ended this benign neglect and sealed Frome's fate.

First, CBS brought in Michael O'Neill as the new publisher of Field & Stream. Then O'Neill fired Conley and replaced him with Samson. Finally, Frome wrote a "Rate Your Candidate" column that outraged the anti-conservationists in Congress.

O'Neill's credentials as an outdoorsman are elusive. He has sold ad space for Look and cooked up a gourmet magazine that fell flatter than a soufflé. Why CBS chose him to pilot an outdoor magazine is a mystery, except for the fact that he shares the network's dim view of hunting. He has told some Field & Stream staffers that hunting is on the way out. No doubt this explains why the magazine recently ran a two-page photograph of Phyllis Diller.

O'Neill's most notable act was his firing of Conley, who disliked the slickness that was creeping into the magazine. Conley had sponsored Frome's tough brand of journalism. Together they had exposed the abuse of America's forests by clear-cutters, stockmen, oil men and mining companies.

The new publisher was reportedly miffed by Frome's barber writing. In 1972 Conley barely prevailed upon O'Neill to schedule the "Rate Your Candidate" column.

Frome's 1972 "Rate Your Candidate" column was indeed a blockbuster. It gave a few lawmakers perfect conservation scores but flunked many more. The column played a major role in the primary election defeat of House Interior Committee Chairman Wayne Aspinall, D-Colo., and it drew many howls of pain. Other legislators complained directly to CBS board chairman William S. Paley.

This tactic was effective because CBS must tirelessly woo congressional backing for its "equal time" and cable TV policies, license renewals and cross-media ownership. These concerns make CBS far more sensitive to the politician's wrath than an independent publisher of Field & Stream would be.

Thus, shortly after the 1972 congressional backlash reached CBS, Field & Stream began restricting Frome's access to his readers. Samson cut the length of his monthly columns and imposed political constraints on them. Last June he refused to print Frome's exposé of shady land deals between New Mexico developers and the Bureau of Land Management. Samson also told Frome there would be no 1974 version of "Rate Your Candidate." Effective journalism, he explained, did not require the naming of names.

December 20, 1974

If Samson and O'Neill thought Frome would pull his punches, they were mistaken. A month ago Frome turned in a typically biting, well-researched critique of the Forest Service's latest public relations campaign. His curt dismissal by Samson came a few days later.

"Mike is one of the great voices of public interest writing," says Conley: "He'll bounce back because he's a fighter, but right now Field & Stream has stripped him of his readers." We thought we'd tell them why.

[From the Lander (Wyo.) High Country News, Nov. 8, 1974.]

MIKE FROME RELEASED BY FIELD AND STREAM
(By Tom Bell)

It was a pleasant surprise to see Mike Frome gazing out of a page of Time magazine as big as life (Nov. 4, 1974). But then I read the article and that was not so pleasant. Mike had been sacked again, this time by Field and Stream magazine.

It seems that Mike's deft dissection of so many environmental problems, and his rapier-like pen used against so many politicians and bureaucrats alike involved so much blood-letting that it frightened the hierarchy of Field and Stream. In that cloistered world of egocentrics and egomaniacs called government, Mike Frome is too much of a threat. He likes to name names and lay too many facts openly before the public. And that threatens special interests.

Mike is gentlemanly charming, keeping his cool and manners even when confronting hostile adversaries. He is intelligent, witty, and knowledgeable. And he makes it a point to inform himself on the matters of which he writes. As a result, he is one of the most effective environmental writers of these pressing times.

When we were having problems in Wyoming, he came not once but several times to see and judge for himself. On one occasion he flew with me over the great Red Desert to see antelope and wild horses and the effects on them of fencing and mining activities. It also happened to be at a time when AT&T was putting in a transcontinental telephone cable—and unknowingly bulldozing out the historic Oregon Trail as a right-of-way. We flew on to see the valley of the Upper Green River and the threats to it of big dams. (The threats today may be more imminent than they were then.) And we ended in Jackson Hole where Mike addressed a group on the threats of clearcutting on the national forests to the famed elk herds of the area.

Along with Dave Bower, he generously lent his prestige to Wyoming's First Environmental Congress. And he just as generously gives of his time and interest to many other environmental efforts.

So it is that the hypocrisy of our system could never be better illustrated than in the case of Mike Frome. We tout our system as being one of freedom for the individual, and we particularly tout our freedom of speech and expression. His experience gives the lie to just how much freedom we really do have.

For years his lucid, penetrating columns appeared in American Forests magazine. But as the powerful special interests in the timber industry began to rape the national forests, his writings became more vehement against them. And he also turned his guns on the Forest Service, accusing it of being a willing accomplice. He was told that his columns must conform to "editorial policy." He refused and was told his columns would no longer be needed.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Now, it is Field and Stream's turn. When he signed on at Field and Stream as environmental editor, his writings were a refreshing change from the traditional "me & Joe" hunting and fishing tales. Mike, and sometimes fellow staffers Richard Starnes and Ted Trueblood, gave readers something more solid to consider than the mere taking or killing of nature's bounty. But, alas, if such mental sustenance was not too much for Field and Stream's readers, it was for the owners, Columbia Broadcasting System, and undoubtedly for many advertisers.

And so a powerful and competing voice for urgent environmental matters has lost another forum. It would be different if Mike Frome preached destruction of the "system." But he does not—only the changes which are ultimately necessary if the system is not to destroy itself.

[From the Outdoor America (Izaak Walton League's publication) December 1974]

MIKE FROME OUSTED BY FIELD AND STREAM

Mike Frome, out-spoken conservationist, author, and member of the IWLA, was released from his post as conservation editor for CBS-owned Field and Stream magazine in October. Frome was ostensibly discharged because the magazine wanted a change in its editorial approach. Field and Stream claims it will now take an even "stronger stand on conservation issues." But Frome insists that "they want to play it safe and steady" and that he was instructed not to "name names" in his hard-hitting comments.

Frome has long been a major asset to conservation, with his straightforward, no-holds-barred approach. He frequently used his column as a platform to denounce legislation which would be harmful to the environment. There are no sacred cows for Frome.

A great deal of controversy surrounded his "Rate Your Congressman" article which appeared in 1972. Senators and Congressmen were rated on their stands for or against conservation issues. Many feel Frome's greatest value is that he spoke effectively to people other than conservationists and he educated thousands who would not have been reached otherwise.

Frome's discharge caused a storm of criticism from the conservation community. A letter signed by all the major conservation groups, including the IWLA, was sent to William Paley, Chairman of the Board of CBS. Frome, who keynoted the 1973 league convention in Duluth, says, "I have been flooded with warm and wonderful messages from all parts of this country, and indeed from other countries as well." One friend noted, "They couldn't stand the heat so they kicked the stove out of the kitchen."

What does Frome think about his situation? "Personally," he said, "I'm looking forward rather than backward."

[From the Missoulian, Missoula (Mont.), Dec. 8, 1974]

FEDERAL MANAGEMENT OF LAND IS BLASTED
(By Don Schwennesen)

Conservation writer Mike Frome blasted federal administration land and resource management policy Saturday in Missoula, calling on citizen conservationists to mount a broad new environmental offensive.

"I consider (Agriculture Secretary Earl) Butz and (Interior Secretary Rogers) Morton two of the most dangerous men in America," Frome said in a keynote address before some 200 people attending the Montana Wilderness Association annual convention. "They don't tell us the facts—they've created a crisis of truth," he said, listing Forest Service Chief John McGuire as a close third to Morton and Butz.

COAL EXPORTS EYED

Picking up the energy-related coal strip-mining issue raised Friday by West Virginia

Rep. Ken Hechler, Frome took note of continuing coal exports from West Virginia, contracts to export Alabama coal and recently revealed plans to export Montana coal—plans that were subsequently dropped.

"On the one hand they tell us we need this coal to sustain our style of living," he said, contrasting the energy crisis claims with a recent Business Week report that Alabama coal exports to Japan are contracted to increase from 60,000 to 10 million tons per year.

When administration and industry officials are confronted with facts on coal export, he said, they side-step the energy crisis and claim the exports are needed to minimize an unfavorable foreign trade balance.

"We've got to get into the hard, gut issues and challenge growth at all levels," Frome told an audience that included regional conservationists, state legislators and Northern Region Forest Service officials.

LOCAL LEADERSHIP

"The leadership has got to come from out here" at the "grass roots level," he said, "where the resources are that the bankers on Wall Street want."

"If you can develop . . . hard line political policy . . . Wall Street isn't going to get them," he said, pointing to major environmental victories won at the polls last month.

"The politicians are coming with us increasingly," he said. "As far as I'm concerned, the fight to save our earth is just getting under way."

The former conservation editor of Field and Stream magazine also recounted events leading up to his firing, charging that a change in editorial management at the magazine had been followed by editorial censorship of columns he wrote exposing a Bureau of Land Management scandal in New Mexico and attacking the Forest Service's "Environmental Program for the Future."

LAND EXCHANGES

In the former case, Frome said, the BLM had worked out irregular land exchanges with the Crowder Investment Company, a private real estate firm, in which Crowder obtained title to over a half million acres of federal land—including valuable land near El Paso and between Albuquerque and Santa Fe.

But in a separate Missoulian interview, Frome blamed his firing on new and incompetent management at Field and Stream, and he discounted rumors that the targets of his columns had pressured the magazine's parent firm CBS, Inc., into giving him the axe.

Seemingly undaunted by the hassle with Field and Stream, Frome noted that he still writes columns and travel features for other magazines, commented on his latest book entitled "Battle for the Wilderness," revealed plans for new books he hopes to write and said that the "personal satisfaction outweighs the trouble by far" in the environmental battle.

FREE TO TALK

"Individually and collectively we can work miracles," he said and added, "don't have it on your conscience that you missed the opportunity."

"The core of the issue is growth, unrestricted and uncontrolled," he said. "Growth demands energy in ever-spiraling volumes. We have acted as though land, air, water, forests, coal, petroleum and metals were limitless."

"Now at last we must recognize the finite capacities not only for our country but for the world," Frome said, suggesting that future national needs must be filled more from present affluence and waste.

"If we want to be responsible conservationists, we must not endorse the policy of developing resources to the point of crisis," Frome said.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR ERVIN

HON. LEE METCALF

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, it would be repetitious to add to the accolades that my colleagues have expressed for my friend and colleague, Senator ERVIN. Since we both served on appellate courts, he will understand when I say that I concur.

Nevertheless, I must comment on his leadership in the passage of the budget control bill. This statute, which may be the most significant legislation to be enacted by Congress in my 22 years of service could not have passed had it not been for the presence of Senator ERVIN as chairman of the Committee on Government Operations. Even though he was concerned with the Watergate investigation and with passage of such legislation as the privacy bills and the right to a speedy trial, he recognized the importance of the budget bill and spent long hours presiding over the discussion of the bill in full committee and the markup.

Senator ERVIN will be long recognized as the hero of the Watergate investigation—fair and impartial and tenacious in the pursuit of corruption. He will be remembered as the champion of constitutional government. He will be fondly recalled for his homespun stories in debate. But when the history of this century is written, I predict he will be most praised for his activities in restoring to Congress control over the finances of the Government of the United States.

JOHN ZWACH

HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, as I leave the Congress, I want to pay tribute to my good friend, JOHN ZWACH, who is also leaving this body.

Some of my colleagues have pointed out JOHN's love for rural America and his efforts in the Congress to effectively preserve and enhance the countryside. But I shall always remember him for his love of country and its people.

I have served with JOHN for a number of years on the Veterans' Affairs Committee. His position is always one of reason and his commitment to veterans and their dependents is widely known by his colleagues in the Congress and everyone knowledgeable in veterans' affairs. He loves his country and he has helped mold a program to provide benefits for those who have served our country in time of war.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

I shall miss JOHN, and Mrs. Dorn joins me in wishing for him and his family continued good health and happiness.

FOOD COMMISSION FINDINGS NOT SQUELCHED

HON. ROMAN L. HRUSKA

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, on Friday, December 13, the distinguished Senator from South Dakota, who has been a candidate for the highest office in the land, inserted an article into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which discussed the plight of the cattlemen.

There were many excellent points made by the author, Mr. Homer Ayres. He correctly pointed out that the conditions facing both the cattle rancher and feeder continue to be very grim. Neither the feeder nor the rancher are able to sell their cattle at prices that even cover their direct costs. Mr. Ayres goes on to state that he feels that the major reason for low cattle prices is the collusive actions of the chain stores that conspire to keep prices down by acting as one single buyer. He further states that this fact of collusion was discovered by the National Commission on Food Marketing—of which I was but one of 15 members appointed by President Lyndon Johnson—but that the findings of this Commission were "squelched from within by a minority reported headed by Senator Hruska."

Mr. President, I am shocked and appalled by this reckless accusation. Allow me to correct the record.

First, I was but one of six individuals who filed the minority report. The others were respectively: William M. Batten, chairman of the J. C. Penney Co., Catherine May, Congresswoman from Washington, Albert K. Mitchell, a rancher from New Mexico, Thurston B. Morton, Senator from Kentucky, and Graham Purcell, Congressman from Texas.

By implication, Mr. Ayres has impugned the honor of these people as well. Second, when has a study or report been "squelched" by the minority report? Where was the majority report? Did we simultaneously bury it when we filed our statement?

Clearly, this is not true. The report states the majority's views first, whereas our minority views were relegated to the last 50 pages of a 200-page report.

Does anyone seriously believe that the minority's views would prevail over our distinguished colleagues Senator WARREN MAGNUSON, GALE MCGEE, PHILIP HART, and six other Commission members?

Third, this report was filed in June of 1966. It is my recollection that Lyndon Baines Johnson, a Democrat, was then President. Both the House and the Senate were dominated by Democratic majorities. Yet, this report was "squelched."

If any improprieties were revealed by this study, it was clearly the responsibility of the executive branch to investigate further. If this was done and it might have been, no major antitrust cases were successfully prosecuted, by the antitrust division of the Justice Department or the Federal Trade Commission.

Parenthetically, let me add that about the time the report came out the FTC dropped its supermarket investigation involving the District of Columbia area for lack of sufficient evidence. Who squelched that investigation?

Fourth, the minority report did not and I repeat, did not, state categorically that there were no anticompetitive abuses occurring in food retailing for that was not its congressional charter. Rather, it systematically indicated that the evidence presented by the majority to prove collusion was wholly inadequate and therefore could not support their policy prescriptions.

It would appear, without once again repeating our original analysis, that we were correct because no antitrust litigation was ever brought by the Johnson administration based on the compiled evidence. In short, any suggestion that Senator Hruska "squelched" the investigation is totally untrue. It is unfair and shows gross, unjustified bias of the author.

Finally, let me emphatically indicate that I am in no position to conclusively judge, one way or another, whether there has been, or currently exists, any anticompetitive abuses in food retailing whether they involve beef or any other product.

As we all know, antitrust cases are extremely complex and involve intensive investigation of all segments of a market.

However, let me present evidence, which by no means is conclusive, but does shed some doubt on the presumption or contention that supermarket chains are colluding when they purchase beef. If this were true, we would certainly expect a greater percentage increase over time in the carcass-retail spread than we would in the farm-to-carcass spread since chainstores allegedly hold down the price they pay for wholesale beef and then market it at monopoly prices.

Yet, the most recent evidence compiled by USDA—Livestock and Meat Situation, October 1974—indicates that since 1970, the farm-carcass spread has risen more than 70 percent, whereas the carcass-retail spread has risen approximately 35 percent or less than half of the farm-carcass spread.

This would imply that supermarkets might well be losing money selling fresh meat as opposed to earning monopoly profits.

This was confirmed for at least one chain, Jewel Food Stores, in testimony before the Council on Wage and Price Stability in which Mr. Perkins presented the internal accounting records for Jewel for 1974 and invited their audit by USDA.

I ask unanimous consent that the entire statement by Mr. Donald Perkins, board chairman of Jewel, be inserted in the RECORD at this time.

December 20, 1974

December 20, 1974

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

In conclusion, Mr. President, let me state that I have been and will continually be intensely concerned with the problems of our Nation's cattle ranchers. However, we are never going to arrive at meaningful solutions by making flagrant, unsubstantiated charges about the activities of individuals, producer groups, or retailers.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESENTATION BY DONALD S. PERKINS

Because the food store is every family's weekly inflation reminder, ours is a highly visible industry in times like these and is easily maligned if for no more logical reason than that we are the last link in the food cycle from farm to consumer. While I accept that as an element of the environment in which we operate, I am anxious today to present certain data which, while not easing one iota the pressure on the personal budgets with which most American families struggle, will suggest that time could be better spent than to further pursue a retail scapegoat on which to blame high food prices.

I find nothing helpful whatsoever in the conduct of those who choose to single out business or labor or government or politicians or the Arabs or the weather as the sole villain in the relatively higher cost of living we have recently experienced. Rather, I think, the more we understand about each sector of the economy the sooner will President Ford's WIN button be a symbol of success rather than a sign of hope. It is in that spirit that I will try to present to you facts about food retailing that cover a meaningful time span and do not represent short-term aberrations.

My overall message will startle some and will probably be misbelieved by others, but it is that:

TABLE 1.—PERCENT OF NET PROFIT RETURN ON SALES

	1964	1965	1966	1967	1968	1969	1970	1971	1972	1973	1st half 1973	1974

29 major publicly owned supermarket companies (in Fortune).

As you can see, the food retailing industry which has always been lower than the 500 industrials was at a high point in 1964 and 1965 when it earned 1.3% on sales. For each dollar of sales the industry earned 1.3 cents. This declined to a low of less than 1/2 of a penny in 1972 for each dollar of sales when 4 of the 29 food retailers operated at a loss totaling $56 million and less than 1/2 of a penny in 1973 when 4 of the 29 food retailers also operated at a loss totaling over $50 million. As you can also see, during this decade Jewel's earnings as a percent to sales have been declining and during the first half of 1974 have been flat.

To put food retail profits in another perspective, the 29 major food retailing companies had aggregate sales totaling $41.3 billion in 1973. The industry earned $310 million on those sales. The 11 largest general merchandise retailers in the United States had 1973 sales of $42.2 billion, about the same as the 29 food retailers. The general merchandise retailers' income, however, was $1.4 billion whereas the 29 food retailers earned $310 million. Thus, with approximately similar sales, the 11 largest general merchandise retailers' profits were over 4 1/2 times those of the 29 major food retailers.

Food consumed at home in the United States takes about 12% of the disposable income of consumers. If you eliminated all of the retail profit currently being "enjoyed" by the food retailing industry, that 12% would decline to about 11.9%... hardly a significant drop!

Now many will quickly point out that re-

Return on net worth or return on investment is not such a mysterious subject when we relate it to the cost of obtaining money for investment. We wouldn't expect individuals to borrow money on their bank credit cards at 18% interest only to re-invest it in savings accounts at 5.5% interest. Similarly, we can't expect to use borrowed or equity funds and invest them at a rate lower than our cost of money, particularly at a time when money costs have been so high.

Many might agree that retail profits and return on net worth have been declining, but would still ask why the industry needs profit. What is it used for? I would like to use Jewel Companies data to answer this question. A simplified cash flow statement for Jewel in 1973 is shown in Table 3.

food retail profits have recently been at a post-World War II record low and are still too low for most supermarket companies to adequately maintain their stores to operate most efficiently in today's competitive climate.

and contrary to what you have read in the press, the retail price spreads or margins in total and particularly for beef and other meat have been relatively flat in spite of dramatically increasing expenses for supermarket operations!

Any thoughtful American shares your concern and all consumers' concerns about rising food prices, and I will be relieved when food supplies increase so that prices can moderate. My hope today is to present to you data which illustrates that the food retailer is not the perpetrator but simply another victim of current inflation.

Table 1 shows the return on sales, for the Fortune 500 industrial companies, 29 major food retailers and for Jewel Companies.

turn on sales is not the best measure of retail profitability—and we agree. However, the decline in earnings as a percent of sales in recent years is readily apparent... all of which should assure anyone that food retailers operate in an extremely competitive environment.

Another measure of profitability is return on net worth or stockholders' equity. Table 2 shows the return on net worth for the Fortune 500 industrials, the 29 food retailers and Jewel Companies. In this particular case food retailing companies compared favorably to the Fortune 500 industrials until 1972 and 1973. Jewel has a modest increase in the first half of 1974 over the price control and freeze period of 1973, but the results are still at historically low levels.

We needed $22.4 million for increased working capital—primarily for inventories, supplies and cash. We needed the additional inventory capital not only because we opened new stores, but also because we paid more for the merchandise we bought for existing stores. This latter need for working capital has been most significant.

In 1972 we had 966 grocery item cost increases, in 1973 we had 7,583 and so far this year we have already had an unbelievable 14,671 grocery item cost increases and the year isn't over. These increases relate to approximately 5,000 grocery items, thus we have had an average of almost three cost increases on each item already this year!

Jewel also spent $77.9 million for new stores and the replacement of existing stores and equipment. The cost of building new stores has increased dramatically over the last ten years. A 25,000 sq. ft. store could be constructed for $233,000 in 1964, $444,000 in 1973. However, it now takes $553,000, a 137% increase in 10 years and a 25% increase in the last year alone and that cost does not include land.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

All the money, however, did not go for new stores. A substantial portion went for replacement and remodeling of existing stores. Every homeowner knows that her home furnishings won't last forever and when they are replaced they typically cost more. Jewel experience is the same. For instance, one 8 foot freezer today costs 65% more than it did in 1964 when we installed many we are now replacing.

We also used $12 million of cash for dividends to our stockholders. At the current dividend rate and even considering the depressed state of the stock market, this represents a return of less than 6% to our shareholders.

Last year, Jewel also used $4.7 million to repay money borrowed in the past. So, as you can see, Jewel spent $117.5 million last year and now, where did we get that money?

First, $29.6 million, or only one-quarter of it, came from profits. Another $36.6 million came from depreciation and deferred items. In an inflationary economy the cash flow which comes from depreciation charges is woefully inadequate to replace older equipment at new higher prices. Our best current estimate is that on average it costs us $1.40 today to replace each $1.00 of depreciated equipment.

Jewel received an additional $800,000 from the sale of its stock to new and existing stockholders. I'm sure if our profits and/or the stock market had been more favorable, we could have raised more money from this source.

This left $50.5 million that we needed and there was no other choice but to borrow it.

As you can see, industry gross margins reached a high point of 20.6% in 1968 and 1969 and a low of 19.97% in 1972.

As you know, gross margins are the difference between what we pay for a product and what we receive for it. With gross margin we pay our expenses. What has happened to food retailing expenses in the past decade? A review of the total expenses of our industry as a percent of sales shows that they have been increasing faster than margins. And, these expenses do not include State and Federal Income Taxes. The spread between these numbers was 2.38% in 1964. In 1972 it was .97% and in 1973, 1.29%.

One of a retailers least understood gross margin challenges is the difficulty of predicting the influence of changes in the consumer's mix of purchases. And changes in purchasing habits have been occurring often and dramatically.

Last year, for instance, our meat tonnage was off 6% while our customers purchased 30% more pasta products. In a fragile, low profit margin business, such a change can have great significance.

For purposes of illustrating the influence of a change in consumer purchase mix, let me assume that we have a six item store rather than an 8,000 item store. There are no other changes except the assumption that customers change some of their purchasing pattern from steak and potato salad to soup and spaghetti. Here's what happens as shown in Table 5.

TABLE 5.—THE SUPERMARKET MIX PROBLEM

	Unit cost	Unit retail	Product mix I sales	Product mix II sales
Campbells Tomato soup.....	0.15	0.19	10	12
Prepared potato salad 1 lb.....	.38	.69	1	0
G/W sugar 4 lbs.....	1.68	1.88	5	5
Hamburger 1 lb.....	.70	.98	5	5
Sirloin Steak 1 lb.....	1.12	1.59	1	0
Red Cross Spaghetti 1 lb.....	.30	.48	5	7
Total units.....			27	29
Total sales.....			$20.88	$19.94
Total cost.....	16.40			15.80
Gross margin (dollars).....	4.48			4.14
Gross margin (percent).....	21.46			20.76

Of course, I realize that a 6 item market basket may seem inadequate or contrived, but let me assure you that the point of this illustration is absolutely as true for a full market basket or for a total store's sales as it is for this illustrative example. We can have a seemingly small change in margin percent (21.46% to 20.76%) without changing one retail price and that only costs us 34 cents of gross margin in this illustration. But that small margin difference if extended to our total food store business would equal the total net profit of Jewel Companies last year! And remember not a price was changed.

Of course the margins or spreads you want most to hear about are those for meat and particularly beef. Cattle supply and demand imbalances have been great and have resulted in much publicity in search of profiteering. The USDA seems to feel that the retailer may be that culprit. I quote from an August Special Task Force Report to Secretary Buttz:

"... The changes in meat price spreads and general marketing costs suggest that profits for retailing meat increased sharply during the first half of 1974. Based on this circumstantial evidence, it appears that the recent increase in meat price spreads was caused partially by food retailers changing their pricing policies to increase profits in their meat departments."

Of course, I don't have current profit information for other companies because each operator normally regards such information as confidential. But the misinformation on this subject has reached such extremes that I'm going to show you actual results of the Jewel Food Stores this year, and I invite the USDA to come audit these numbers if they doubt my word.

Had the Task Force sought out this type of real rather than circumstantial evidence they would have realized that their statistics are incorrect and their conclusion is wrong!

Our accountants generate income statements for our various store departments. Perhaps you will be surprised to learn that we lost money selling fresh meat thus far in 1974. In the first half of 1974 on sales of $95 million of fresh meat, the Jewel Food Stores lost over $5 million before charges for interest and taxes. Obviously we have not found a way to operate a supermarket without fresh meat and consumer price resistance and competitive pressures dictate that we can't charge more for fresh meat.

$14.8 million of this was borrowed through mortgages on our stores. However, $35.6 million was lent to us not secured by a mortgage but by general credit. Is this important? Ask Penn Central, Pan Am and other service companies who are not profitable, if they can borrow enough money to continue to provide outstanding service efficiently.

We are not asking you to feel sorry for us. It is our responsibility to make sure that we don't spend more cash than we can generate from profit and the prudent use of additional debt. We only ask that you understand that in the tough competitive climate in which we're operating we too are concerned about inflation's impact. In fact, we are rethinking our entire new store program and the replacement program for existing equipment. We certainly can't reinvest cash we don't have. Let's now talk about margins and expenses and their trends over the last ten years as shown in Table 4.

However, you're probably not concerned with whether we make money or lose money selling beef. What you are concerned about is the spread. Let's look at the actual costs and percent and cents per pound price spreads in recent years in the Jewel Food Stores. These numbers in Table 6 come directly from our accounting records.

Note the interesting correlation between cost and retail. When cost goes up or down, so does the retail price with very minor exceptions.

If the average retail prices per pound look low to you, you probably are overlooking the fact that out of a 1,000 lb. live steer or heifer we end up with a 600 lb. carcass and from that we sell about 180 lbs. of bone and fat for about 10c per lb. Of course we'd rather not bring that bone and fat into our stores, but our union contracts do not permit central processing.

During the first 32 weeks of 1974, when margins per pound actually ranged from 15.5c to 19.1c we were being... and still are being... accused of raising our margin or spread to 40c or more. We'd have a good profit instead of a fresh meat department loss if we had a spread anywhere near what the USDA says we have. The USDA statistics in this area are simply not accurate.

To show you that the story is essentially the same if you look at the entire meat department, look at Table 7. And I think that Jewel's experience is fairly typical. Our percent and our cents per pound margins were actually lower in our meat departments in the first 32 weeks of 1974 than they were in 1973.

Throughout my comments today I've mentioned expenses. Unfortunately, we do not have current industry-wide data for individual expense items, but we do have Jewel

Food Store expense information which I think you'll find of interest. In an attempt to give you the facts without revealing confidential data, Table 8 traces important operating information using 1964 as the base year.

TABLE 8.—JEWEL COMPANIES PER WEEK PER STORE INDEX

	1964 (base year)	1965	1970	1971	1972	1973	1973 (1st 32 weeks)	1974
Sales.....	100	161	187	202	218	254	240	309

Transportation/warehousing.....	100	170	220	232	252	290	269	349

As you can see, sales have more than doubled by 1973 to 254 over the base of 100. Perhaps more important than sales is gross margin. Margins have lagged sales in all years except 1972 when they were equal and the lag is identical in the first 32 weeks of 1974 to what it was in the same period of 1973.

Since our margins exist to cover our expenses, let's review them starting with payroll and supply expense. As you can see, in every year payroll and supply expense is increasing at a faster rate than our gross margin. Although we have instituted many productivity improvement programs and are proud of our leadership in this regard, it has been impossible for us to be sufficiently productive to overcome rising payroll costs.

Advertising and rent have not risen as fast as either gross margin or sales through 1973. In the years 1968, 1970, and 1971 utility costs did not go up as fast as margin dollars and we would normally expect utilities to be a somewhat fixed expense. However, beginning in 1972 and into 1973 and 1974 you can see dramatic changes in utility costs in relation to the past. And Jewel in Chicago has not been impacted as heavily as our stores in New England, because Chicago generates a greater percentage of its energy from nuclear power. In New England, even after cost savings of $220,000 through reduced usage, our utility costs are up by over $1 million in the first 32 weeks of this year, and that increase occurred in only 57 stores.

Health Insurance for our people reached 480, almost five times it's level 10 years ago. I do not need to tell you about the inflationary trends in hospital and health care, which have impacted our company significantly. As you can see, each and every year, health costs are rising faster than margins and the spread is widening.

But the award for fastest growth goes to various taxes other than taxes on income. This expense has increased at the fastest rate on the chart. In 1964 taxes other than income taxes were $6,500 per store. This year the comparable number is $26,800 per store.

Finally, transportation and warehousing, the truck fleet, drivers, maintenance, gas and oil and warehouse operations are also increasing faster, than gross margins in spite of new mechanical equipment, larger trucks and considerable investment to make productivity improvements possible.

I could go on about other expenses, especially interest expense, but the trends are obvious and the reasons for decreasing returns on investment in food retailing are apparent. Most importantly, you can see that food retailing margins must increase and not decrease if an efficient food distribution system is to continue to operate in the United States.

We are living in a difficult period of time. We are all frustrated by inflation and are looking around to see who's at fault. Food retailers are frustrated too! We have not increased our margins enough to cover rising expenses much less to achieve exorbitant profits.

The challenge for all of us is:

1. To encourage all out farm production.
2. To encourage changes in business, labor and government practices which inhibit food industry productivity, and
3. To encourage new investment which will provide the tools for food industry productivity improvement and which will enable ancillary industries such as transportation companies and utilities to maintain their service at a level needed to support continued efficient food distribution.

We have previously submitted these ideas in more detail to the recent summit conferences organized by President Ford. My comments may not be what you had hoped to hear as you search for an available culprit on which to blame higher prices... but to the best of my ability to tell it, it's the story of food retailing in 1974.

HON. KENNETH J. GRAY

HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, our colleague KEN GRAY can point to tangible manifestations of his public service that are unsurpassed in America today. As the dynamic, creative, and diligent chairman of the Public Buildings and Grounds Subcommittee KEN GRAY has played an incalculable role in enhancing the efficiency of the Federal Government's operations as well as the physical appearance of its buildings.

Through his diligence and his persuasiveness KEN GRAY has succeeded in developing a Federal public buildings program that combines architectural excellence with efficient use of taxpayers' money. It is largely due to KEN's tenacious efforts that a National Visitors Center is now under construction at Union Station, a center that will properly introduce millions of Bicentennial visitors to the splendors of the Nation's Capital.

The Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, JFK Stadium, and countless other magnificent projects in Washington and throughout the Nation are evidence of his vision and dedication.

To name but one other, I personally know of his efforts in securing a magnificent new Federal building for our State's Capital City Columbia.

Mr. Speaker it has been my great personal pleasure to serve with Congressman GRAY on the great Committee on Public Works. We appreciate his outstanding work for the committee and for the Nation and wish for KEN every happiness and continued success in the years ahead.

SENATOR NORRIS COTTON OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

HON. JAMES O. EASTLAND

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, it has been my privilege to know NORRIS COTTON as a fellow Member of the Senate throughout all the years since he was first elected to the Senate in 1954 to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator Charles W. Tobey. I feel keenly the loss to the Senate which will result from his decision to retire.

His distinguished 20 years in the Senate has been only the most recent part of his service to his native State which goes back half a century. He was first elected to the New Hampshire House of Representatives in 1928 when he was a young man still in his twenties. He had then already seen service in Washington as secretary to Senator George H. Moses in the years 1924-28.

He served as speaker of the New Hampshire House of Representatives and served four terms as a Member of the U.S. House of Representatives from New Hampshire before he came to the Senate.

I shall miss NORRIS COTTON and while I know that he looks forward to his retirement in his native New Hampshire, I hope that he will from time to time visit Washington and the floor of the Senate where he has so many friends and where he has rendered such distinguished service.

RABBI SAMUEL KORFF

HON. MARGARET M. HECKLER

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mrs. HECKLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, The recent and untimely death of Rabbi Samuel Korff brings deep sorrow to all those who have admired and respected his outstanding work. The Rabbi's long list of commendable accomplishments include his service as Rabbinic Administrator of the Associated Synagogues of Massachusetts and his leadership for 35 years of Congregation Kehillath Jacob. Additionally, Rabbi Korff was the driving force behind the Rabbinical Court of Justice and served as Jewish chaplain to the Boston Fire Department and the Deer Island House of Correction. His program to certify packaged foods as kosher has received national recognition. Rabbi Korff's extensive efforts on behalf of the entire community will be greatly missed, but his vital accomplishments will stand as a lasting tribute to this dedicated American.

THE RETIREMENT OF DR. FLOYD M. RIDDICK

HON. WILLIAM D. HATHAWAY

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, there are 100 Senators who work in this Chamber for improvement in the quality of life for all Americans and for the Nation. It is important work, and necessary work, and at times it is visible work, for the Nation and its press watches us carefully. Occasionally credit is given, flashbulbs pop, and a Senator is recognized for this achievement or that. But, Mr. President, there is a force that guides this body other than that of a Senator or elected officials.

When this 93d Congress adjourns in the near future, our Senate Parliamentarian, Dr. Floyd M. Riddick, will retire. He is not an elected official, his name never appears on a piece of legislation, and he never makes the front pages of our national press. But he is as much responsible for the good that comes out of this Chamber as any Senator, for it is his guidance and his unique knowledge of parliamentary procedure that permits the hundreds of bills and resolutions to flow through this Chamber and into the laws of our society.

It would be inappropriate to call him an unsung hero, for all of us here do recognize the valuable role he plays in our deliberations. But there are few opportunities for him to take the credit he so richly deserves, and I am especially proud today to publicly thank him for his expertise and patience. The former has been invaluable in making it possible for this body to function in an efficient manner; the latter is for his understanding of those of us whose zeal to deal with an issue sometimes clashes with established rules and procedures.

Those qualities are rare, and will be sorely missed. Dr. Riddick has served his Nation well during his many years of service here, and I wish him and his wife Marguerite the very best of success and happiness in the future.

BUDDHIST CHURCHES OF AMERICA

HON. PHILLIP BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, on the closing day of the 93d Congress, I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD remarks relating to the 75th anniversary of the founding of the Buddhist Churches of America. I would like to place some additional material in the RECORD at this time relating to the same subject. The text follows:

BUDDHIST CHURCHES OF AMERICA

The Buddhist Churches of America is an incorporated religious organization of Buddhist Churches of the Jodo Shinshu faith on the mainland of the United States. The organization consists of 60 churches and 40 branches located throughout the nation with 80 ministers actively serving the spiritual needs of over 100,000 Buddhists of Shinshu faith.

NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS

The administrative offices of the National Headquarters for the Buddhist Churches of America are located at 1710 Octavia Street, San Francisco, California 94109. The administrative duties are conducted by the Office of the Presiding Bishop, the Executive Secretary, the Youth Department, the Sunday School Department, English Secretary, Japanese Secretary, and Bookstore Personnel.

The 60 independent churches and 40 branches are located throughout the continental United States from the west to the east coast. They are divided geographically into eight districts:

Southern District: Los Angeles area, Southern California, Arizona.
Central District: Fresno area.
Coast District: Monterey area.
Bay District: San Francisco Bay area.
Northern District: Sacramento area.
Northwest District: Washington, Idaho, Oregon.
Mountain States District: Utah, Colorado, Wyoming, Nebraska.
Eastern District: Illinois, Ohio, New Jersey, New York, Washington, D.C.

MINISTERS

The 80 ministers actively serving the spiritual needs of the Buddhists of Jodo Shinshu faith constitute the BCA Ministerial Association. The Association meets biennially and elects the Chairman of the Ministerial Association every two years. The Chairman of the Ministerial Association presides over the affairs of the Ministerial Association and represents the voice of the ministers at the BCA Board of Directors Meetings.

AFFILIATED ORGANIZATIONS

Affiliated organizations are maintained by each church in order to meet the spiritual, social, and educational needs of all age group members. The principal organizations are The Buddhist Women's Association, Adult Buddhist Association, Young Buddhist Association, and Sunday School Teachers Association. These affiliated organizations are organized into larger leagues and federations. One representative from each league or federation represents the voice of their respective organizations at the BCA Board of Directors Meetings.

EDUCATIONAL CENTERS

There are two educational centers in the United States; the Institute of Buddhist Studies located at 2717 Haste Street, Berkeley, California 94704, and the American Buddhist Academy located at 332 Riverside Drive, New York, New York 10025.

BUREAU OF BUDDHIST EDUCATION

Sunday School Department:
The Sunday School Department coordinates the activities of and gives guidance to all Sunday schools under the jurisdiction of the Buddhist Churches of America.

Youth Department:

The Youth Department coordinates the activities and offers guidance to all young Buddhist organizations under the jurisdiction of the Buddhist Churches of America.

Adult Department:

The Adult Department is concerned with adult education.

Music Department:

The Music Department is concerned with the promulgation of Buddhist music among the Buddhist congregation.

FINNISH AMERICANS: A PROUD HERITAGE

HON. ROBERT P. GRIFFIN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, as this Nation approaches its 200th anniversary of the Declaration of Independence, it is well to recognize the fact that America today is the result of the contributions of many different groups of people.

One ethnic group with a proud heritage is the Finnish American, whose toll and talent helped carve the mines and clear the wilderness of the northern Midwest.

Perhaps nowhere is the presence of the Finn more evident than the Upper Peninsula of Michigan, where the climate and the striking natural beauty reminds one of Finland. As a result thousands of Finns chose upper Michigan as their new homeland.

Northern Michigan University, located in Marquette on the shores of Lake Superior, chose to focus upon the manifold contributions of the Finn, in its sponsorship of Finnish Culture Week, December 16-21. It was part of the university's yearlong 75th anniversary observance.

One of the features of the week was an address by Dr. John I. Kolehmainen, professor of political science at Heidelberg University, Ohio, a noted scholar and authority on Finnish immigrant culture.

I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FROM UNDERGROUND MINES TO BACKWOODS FARMS

(By John I. Kolehmainen)

To most Finns, coming as they did from the Old Country largely unskilled, impecunious, and rural in background, a job—in the mines and quarries, logging camps and sawmills, railroads and ore docks, factories and fishing fleets—was a life-and-death necessity.

Many thousands of Finns, it was said, descended directly from emigrant trains into the flickering darkness of Upper Michigan copper and iron mines. Their first experiences remained indelibly etched in their memories. About a quarter after six in the evening, the underground night shift began to congregate in the change house, where they dressed in heavy, ore-stained clothing and boots, and put on metal helmets equipped with small open torches. The miners, old-timers and novices, walked slowly to a tall and eerily-looking shafthouse. Inside a bell was clanging as a giant drum wound up a huge cable running out from a steep and ugly shaft opening. As the men waited for the cage to reach the surface, they stopped their idle banter, becoming strangely quiet and serious, as if awed by what lay below.

The miners piled into the cage, thirty at a time, three abreast, each of them holding a tin lunch pail firmly in his lap. The cage jerked clumsily upward a few inches, like a startled colt whose bit had been seized. Then suddenly, the earth opened up and the workers plunged swiftly into a black watery hole sometimes a distance of nearly a mile. The newcomers had never seen such blackness: a subservient realm of night, broken only by the dim illumination of a few electric lights and the bobbing, seemingly off-and-on torches on the men's helmets, which looked like the leering eyes of shadowy monsters.

Nearly 300 men were working the night shift. Cousin Jack and Irish miners—the aristocrats of the underground world—sounded a steady rat-tat-tat with their heavy two-man drills as they bore deep holes into the rock, which were later packed with dynamite. The trammers, largely the more recently arrived Finns, Italians, and South Slavs, did the backbreaking work. In front of every two trammers stood an empty, squat trammer, weighing more than a ton. The trammer's first task was to fill the trammer with rock that had been more or less loosened by the previous shift's blasting. They puffed and sweated and sometimes cursed as they smashed their sledges against the larger chunks and lifted and shoveled the heavy rock. The bottom of the car was soon covered; more slowly, ever more slowly it seemed, the contents rose to the quarter, the half, and finally, the full mark. "Not yet," warned an old-timer as the novice was about to put his shovel down. "It has to be heaping full, at least two and a half tons, otherwise the boss will complain." Their clothes had become rust-stained with ore and perspiration. "Come on," a greenhorn was advised by his companion, who had stripped to the waist, "you'd better shed your lordly skin too."

December 20, 1974

At last the trammer was loaded, but their work was not finished. This three and one-half mountain had to be pushed by hand and shoulder down the drift a distance of several thousand feet to the shaft. A slight downgrade helped somewhat, but the tracks were uneven and the curves sharp; the wheels of the car, wobbling around seldom-greased axles, wedged tight against the rails as the two miners inched around the turn.

At the shaft they dumped the ore into a skip, and then started back up the grade toward the stope, grunting hard every foot of the way.

There was no rest for the trammers. Paid on a contract or piecework basis, they had to load at least twenty tons of rock and to make from eight to ten trips from the stope to the shaft if they wanted to earn a daily wage of about two and a half dollars. The wheels of the underground mill turned swiftly indeed. Faster—faster—faster! More ore! More ore!

One Finn has recorded for posterity the agonizing initiation process by which a tender neophyte was hardened into an underground denizen. "My first days were a foretaste of hell," he wrote. "After making several trips from the diggings to the shaft, pushing the heavy tramcar, I was wretchedly tired. My thirst was unquenchable; sweat flowed in rivulets from my pores. My legs threatened to give way, and my body became limp. But I had to go on—my pride insisted on that. My partner saw that I was exhausted. But instead of slowing his pace, he speeded it; apparently he wanted to show me what America was like, and to exhibit the strength of an old-time trammer. When lunch-time came, I was well-nigh prostrate; my food did not go down; my eyes saw dimly; my ears rang; my heart pounded violently. But I couldn't give up—everyone would have laughed at me. As we rode the cage to the surface after the shift was over, my partner showed me his gnarled, rust-eaten hands, and then remarked, 'When your paws are like these, then you'll be able to stand the pace.'"

In such toil passed the nights, the days. Some Finns became well-adjusted to the mole-like way of life. "In the mines we are at home," one often heard them argue over their lunch. "It never rains down here; we don't suffer from the scorching heat of the summer sun or the biting winter winds that sweep across Lake Superior. We are free from the worries of the upper world."

Indeed, many Finns began to take uncommon pride in their occupation, and looked upon themselves as a band of Herculean heroes, who pitted their brawn against a tenacious Mother Earth, compelling her to yield her treasures. They laughed at the ever-present dangers of accidental death or injury, or more often, put their lives, in a sort of fatalistic way, in the safekeeping of Jesus. The ordinary butcher-baker-candlestick maker functions performed in broad daylight were, of course, the objects of undisguised scorn. "If there were more women in this world to do those jobs," bragged these underground dwellers, "then perhaps we could make trammers of even so-called men."

Talk of mining filled the streets of the mining towns, the saloons, boardinghouses, and saunas. Greenhorns and greybeards trammed and drilled, timbered, sunk shafts and dynamited—even in their dreams.

There was, however, a more ominous side to the mining saga. To begin with, the industry before the First World War was fraught with the dangers of accidents. Reported in the cold print of newspapers and periodicals, they did not often evoke strong emotions. The Aamurisko of New York Mills, Minnesota, reported that twelve Finns had perished in the Ishpeming, Michigan, mines during 1887, and added, "Most fortunate is he who can work on his own land." In Marquette County, Michigan, "ghastly and agonizing" whistles blew a dirge for twenty-nine miners, twelve of them Finnish, who during the year ending September 30, 1902, failed to return from the pits.

Of thirty-eight burial aids paid by a Finnish fraternal organization in Michigan during the year ending June 30, 1900, twenty-five were for accidental deaths. In the years 1900-1903, 146 fatal accidents occurred in seventeen Houghton County mines.

These data became far more alarming when verbalized in purple prose by amateur writers in the Finnish-American press. Herewith some samples:

"Accidents are always happening. The ceiling tumbles down, the side walls collapse, the timber supports snap, or the dynamite goes off unexpectedly."

"The everlasting, gnawing fear, the anxious upward glances at the large chunks of rock and ore hanging over their heads, which seemed to warm, 'Beware! Some day we'll fall and bury you!' Then one day, a sudden crash, the walls heave and quiver, then fall apart. Men shriek in terror, run down the drift toward the shaft, their only road of escape. But it's too late: a black, suffocating blanket envelopes everything. A rough curse is heard, and the faint, pitiful cries of distress, then the awful silence of death."

Fatal and maiming injuries were not the only evils of mining. "My rubber boots filled with sweat, it was like wading in water," recalled a Finn of his unpleasant experiences in a hot Ironwood mine. From the Mesabi Range came the charge that open-pit work too was "wet, dirty, and thoroughly disagreeable." Complaints of personal disabilities were heard: "My back began to give way, rheumatism grumbled in my knees, my ruddy cheeks were changing into the color of the vaulted Republican 'dinner pail.'" The portrait etched from these materials was not inspiring:

"For many a year he'd toiled in the mine, And for wages he had pocketed An ailing body besides his bread, A caved-in chest and a crooked spine."

"Health and vigor," warned a Calumet, Michigan, daily, "are worth more than any other treasure." The neighboring Hancock, Michigan, newspaper prophesied: "Back to the land! Back to the land! This will be the motto of those who have lost their health in the mines."

The exodus to the cutover lands of northern Michigan, Minnesota, and Wisconsin was speeded by unsuccessful strikes and blacklists, and the honeyed words of glitzy land agents. By 1914, the region, well described as "a desert of stumps and tree tops and brush," was dotted with Finnish settlers, whose first beginning was "a tiny, rough-lumber, tarpapered shanty."

The wasteland was not easily won. Every opened furrow, glistening in the sun with sweat and tears, was eloquent evidence that "in this life, bread does not come through play." Work days were long, providing no time for the newcomer to "observe the rising or the setting of the sun. He noted only that the days were too short in his kingdom." The ugly countenances of stones and boulders leered from beneath the mulch. Imperishable pine stumps sweated resin in the heat of summer, as though shedding tears at the graves of the fallen giants.

The former miner (or factory hand, or fisherman, or seaman, or railroad worker) confidently tested his sharp axe-blade against the nearest stump. "The wound grinned at him like a resinous mouth. He swung the axe a second time, and he now felt how deep the roots really were. The earth shook, but the pitch-filled tentacles clung fast to the sand and the stones. He swung again, and again, in a frenzy, but the stump won the battle—it did not budge." After hours of maddening toil, the intruder "realized for the first time that his quest for fortune in the wilderness would not be as easy as he had imagined." Like Willa Cather's pioneer, he came face to face with the truth that "this land wanted to be let alone, to preserve its own fierce strength, its peculiar savage kind of beauty, its uninterrupted mournfulness."

Such a formidable and hostile foe merited a worthy antagonist, and the wilderness found its match in the Finnish immigrants. "They seem to thrive," reported a writer in 1912, "where the hardships are most severe."

What assets, what attributes of body and mind, did the Finn possess that made triumph possible, more often than not, in this mighty, desperate, silent struggle?

First of all, he generally brought into the fray arms of steel, and a body which, although not always gargantuan in outside dimensions, was wiry, resilient like the juniper tree, driven by a well-nigh inexhaustible fund of power. The Finns were, in the words of one of their number, "healthy, stiff-necked, endowed with the strength of a bear and the endurance of a mule."

A second, highly important advantage was found in the Finns' conception of their unique nature and their mission in life. To them, a wilderness blazer's role was no fortuitous adventure, no passing episode, but a charge pregnant with meaning and inner satisfaction. Many immigrants believed that God had commanded men to seek their happiness from the soil, and were reassured by the words, "When God wanted to make man completely happy, He put him on a piece of land." It was widely held that the special obligation of the Finns, in whom it was said dwelled an irresistible "land spirit," was to conquer the wasteland, to carve "little holdings out of forest and rock-strewn soil." In addition, a backwood's existence meant the opportunity to satisfy the old deep-rooted craving of the impoverished landless to own land. "The Finn is singular," affirmed one of them, "in that sooner or later he is conquered by an unreasoning, mad passion to own his own place, which means that he has to get a small plot of land, on which he can stand legs apart and say, 'This is mine and others have no right to trespass here.' He has to have something, if only a birch tree, a spruce, or a pine, a goat or a cow, around which he can fling his arms and exclaim, 'This no one, not even the richest lord, can take away from me. For this is mine!'" A house of his own, thus, was the dream of every Finn. Here he could exult:

"Here I am lord and give commands Free from the bosses' bad intent. My toll's rewarded by my lands, Which once to the extortioner went. A third asset was the willingness to sacrifice present comforts for the promise of future rewards. As a rule, the Finns "worked harder, saved more, and lived with fewer of the material comforts" than their American neighbors, who, as the immigrants observed, frequently "had too many ornaments in the front room . . . too many paintings in the guest room." The Spartan standard of the immigrant demanded: "Be content with the sternest simplicity. Deny every pleasure and luxury. Avoid day dreams and high hopes." Often enough, Finnish thrift was regarded by outsiders as an excellent trait. "If the Finns' frugality would be contagious," complimented one, "it would become one of our most valuable national assets." Sometimes, be it admitted, self-denial and carried to extremes, the immigrants emulating "the ways of the bees and the ants too earnestly."

Let no man underestimate the significance of the fourth asset: the Finnish farm wife. "Never attempt to sell a farm or cutover Farm land to a man whose wife objects to moving to the country," was the sound advice given to the American Railway Development

Association in 1922 by a foremost Finnish-American colonizer. In truth, the wilderness would not have been tamed without the pioneer woman, working on an 8-hour schedule: 8 hours in the morning, 8 hours in the afternoon and evening. Three quotations serve to reveal the extent of her activity. "It was back-breaking, grubbing, lugging, tauging work with stumps and brush and roots so that her body ached with weariness, sheer and utter," was a native American's picture of the immigrant woman. A second writer pointed out that the hardy, yet soft-spoken Martha "plowed and sowed, hoed and harrowed, dug ditches, cut hay, and gathered the harvest better than her spouse." "Farming and cattle-raising," read a third description, "were left in the hands of the wife, who in addition acted as the dairymaid, stableman, veterinarian, doctor, bookkeeper, tailor, shoemaker, carpenter, midwife, trapper, poultry specialist, and so on." With justification did the Finnish immigrant farm wife ask: "When did I begin my work today? At what hour of the night did I find rest? What is my recreation?" And surely she had every right to bite her tongue in suppressed anger when concealed or blind males described wilderness-breaking as a "man's job."

The Finns' fifth asset was sisu, a quality that defies simple translation, that is a rare combination of courage, persistence, doggedness, the ability to take the bad with the good, the unexpected with the calculated. The Americanism "guts" is part of it, as is the saying, "The Finn doesn't know enough to quit." It is vividly described in Finland's national poet's, Johan Ludwig Runeberg's The Peasant Paavo, which must be known to many of you.

"A courage and a hardihood almost heroic," an abiding faith in the rural way of life, a patient and plodding wife, and stern austerity—these have been the essential ingredients for success in the cutover regions of the Middle West. The immigrants' achievements have elicited generous praise and recognition. The Finn, testified the agricultural agent of Houghton County, Michigan, "took over that cutover land when nobody else in the world had the courage to tackle the proposition. . . . He turned that worthless stumpage into mighty valuable farm land." Minnesota's able historian, Grace Lee Nute, expressed the view that "probably no other group could take over stump land, perhaps also burned over, and make successful farming country of it." Extravagant was the eulogium bestowed by a book reviewer in The New York Times: "In a land of charred stumps, the Finns are creating a paradise."

Of course, it was not heaven. But who will deny that the neat, substantial frame dwellings, the sunlit fields and wind-touched meadows, the barns and grazing cows, the garden plots of turnips and potatoes, represented a noteworthy advance, within the span of less than a generation, over the ragged wasteland where the Finnish immigrants had begun.

HON. HUGH L. CAREY

HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment one of the most significant elections this past fall was the election of our good friend and beloved colleague HUGH CAREY as Governor of the Empire State of New York. HUGH CAREY has been an outstanding Congressman and will be a superb Governor. He will, I predict, be a national leader. HUGH CAREY has the ability, the personality, the dedication, and the energy to be one of the greatest Governors in the Nation's history. He is ready for the assignment and I believe his administration of the Empire State will point the way to solution of some of our most pressing national problems. To "Governor" CAREY and to his wonderful family we wish the best always and every continued success in the future.

EDWARD GURNEY LABORED DILIGENTLY FOR VITAL PROGRAMS

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Florida (Mr. GURNEY) is one of the Members of this body who will not be with us when the Congress reconvenes on January 14. I express appreciation to Senator GURNEY for his contributions to the work of the Senate on vital issues and programs.

The Senator from Florida was elected by a constituency that is composed of significant numbers of senior citizens. As a member of the Special Committee on Aging, Senator GURNEY has worked to develop legislation to aid the elderly of our Nation. We have served together on this committee.

Additionally, I have had the opportunity to work with the Senator from Florida when he was a member of the Public Works Committee during the 91st Congress. As chairman of the committee, I know of the diligent labor of Senator GURNEY in the important matters coming before our panel. His counsel and cooperation were noteworthy in the areas of road improvements, water resources development, and pollution abatement programs.

It is my hope that Senator GURNEY will have opportunities for further service during future years.

TRIBUTE UPON RETIREMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE JOHN A. BLATNIK

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ROONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, one of the great strengths of this Nation during its long and glorious 200-year history has been its ability to produce great leaders from rural America. Such a man is my dear friend the Honorable JOHN A. BLATNIK of Minnesota.

JOHN BLATNIK has had a long and distinguished career of public service that he can justly be proud of. Whether it was his 8 years as a teacher and administrator, his 4 years as a Minnesota State Senator, his 3½ years of dangerous military espionage service during World War II or his 28 years here in the House of Representatives, JOHN always had the public welfare and service to his constituents and his State in his heart and brain. During the nearly three decades that I have known JOHN here in the Congress, I have always been greatly impressed by his grasp of the facts and problems that have faced our great country.

Mr. Speaker, if I may I would like to take the remaining minute to congratulate the people of the Eighth District of Minnesota for their high intelligence in originally electing and then many times reelecting JOHN BLATNIK to the Congress of the United States. I know that both they and the Members of the House of Representatives will miss JOHN BLATNIK and his many strengths and talents very much.

Mrs. Rooney joins me in wishing JOHN and Gisela and their family many, many years of good health and happiness.

THE RETIREMENT OF WILLIAM E. TIMMONS

HON. GALE W. MCGEE

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. MCGEE. Mr. President, William E. Timmons, chief of the White House's congressional liaison operation, has retired. The Nation is losing a very valuable public servant who personally fashioned a White House liaison effort second to none.

It is particularly noteworthy that so many Members of this body have joined in paying special tribute to Bill Timmons. It is a mark of respect and admiration for an individual who, although serving in the executive branch of government, conducted his duties in a manner responsive to the legislative branch of government and its particular needs.

I take pride in the friendship and personal working relationship I have had with Bill over these many years. He set a high standard of honesty and integrity which proved to be an invaluable strength during one of the most difficult times in our history as a Nation. It is the mark of an exceptional man to have gained the trust and admiration of so many under the most difficult of circumstances.

Bill Timmons' shoes will be difficult to fill. I personally regret that he will not be directing the White House liaison effort when the 94th Congress convenes on January 14. Nevertheless, I want to wish Bill the best, and I am confident that he will also excel in his new endeavor.

EDITH GREEN—OREGON'S DISTINGUISHED FIRST LADY

HON. ROBERT L. LEGGETT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 18, 1974

Mr. LEGGETT. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to pay tribute and to recognize the work and dedication of EDITH GREEN, the First Lady of the State of Oregon.

December 20, 1974

Superlatives are the order of the day for describing the attributes of public servants, but they are particularly easily come by in referring to Oregon's only lady Congresswoman.

EDITH worked at the committee and House level on education and poverty problems for nearly two decades innovating, funding, amending, and polishing programs on elementary and higher education and in the poverty area. She co-authored most of the major education bills accepted since the early 1960's by most Americans as a birthright.

Congresswoman GREEN not only had the aggressiveness to develop and organize education legislation according to her best judgment, but she had the courage to condemn part of her own work when she unfortunately determined that money uncontrolled was not accomplishing the required objectives.

Courage it took to condemn bills and parts of bills designed to help the poor and deprived when many times that condemnation forced her into alliances with folks who traditionally had small brief for the original purposes of the legislation.

It is still perhaps too early to judge Congresswoman GREEN's effectiveness. She has certainly sounded the alarm that money alone, whether it be in the poverty or education field, may not resolve the unfulfilled aspirations of the multitudes.

She has caused many bureaucrats and legislators considerable unrest respecting the programs and direction of many popular Federal social programs.

Thoughtful, persevering, courageous people like EDITH GREEN of Oregon are all too uncommon in Washington's legislative halls.

Fortunately from a new position away from Capitol Hill, we will undoubtedly continue to hear distinguished critique of public issues from the marvelous gentle-lady from Oregon.

SENATOR SAM J. ERVIN, JR.

HON. ROMAN L. HRUSKA
OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to salute a distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from North Carolina. There are only a few days left in this session of the Congress. When it ends, with it will end the Senate career of a fine man and a good friend, Senator SAM ERVIN.

I have had the privilege of knowing and working with Senator ERVIN for many years. We have shared many rewarding experiences as members of the Judiciary Committee. We have not agreed on every issue to come before us, but I have the utmost respect for Senator ERVIN's integrity, dedication to principle and knowledge of the law.

Senator ERVIN has earned a deserved reputation as an expert on the Constitution of the United States and he is renowned for his defense of first amendment rights for citizens of our country.

Senator ERVIN will be sorely missed in the U.S. Senate. His leadership, energy, and initiative have been an example to us all.

His many honors, awards, and tributes stand as testimony to his greatness. He has left a lasting mark on this body and the entire country. He has served well the people of his home State of North Carolina. I know they are proud of his record and grateful for his devotion to them.

I join with my colleagues today in paying tribute to Senator ERVIN. And I want to thank him for the counsel, wisdom, and friendship he has shared with me through the years.

TRIBUTE TO THE HONORABLE TOM GETTYS

HON. JAMIE L. WHITTEN

OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, as this Congress comes to a close, I do not recall a period when we have lost so many of our friends through voluntary retirement. Our colleague, Tom Gettys of South Carolina, has had a long service here on Capitol Hill, first as assistant to my good friend Hon. Dick Richards, and then as Congressman from the same district.

Possessed of a remarkable memory and wit, experienced and understanding in public affairs, truly Tom has made for a better Congress and for a better country. His sense of humor has been a comfort to all of us and I only regret that the majority of the Congress has not followed his excellent advice and sound judgment to a greater degree than it has.

It is with genuine regret that we bid Tom goodbye so far as his service here is concerned, but we do hope that he will be back with us and that he and his family will enjoy many happy and successful years as they return to South Carolina, our beloved neighboring State.

HOWARD METZENBAUM WAS FAIR AND FAITHFUL IN HIS SENATE SERVICE

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, we have all been at gatherings where a guest or a speaker long overstayed his welcome. We may recall other occasions at which a speaker is so commanding of our attention that we are sorry to see him leave the podium.

HOWARD METZENBAUM is one of those in the second category. His stay has been short, yet he has captured our attention.

He ran for the Senate in 1970, but lost in a strenuously contested race to our colleague Bob TAFT. Then, last year, HOWARD was appointed to fill the unexpired term of William Saxbe, who had been named by the President to be Attorney General of the United States.

In the short period—less than a year—that he has been here, Senator METZENBAUM has attended faithfully and vigorously to his duties, and has admirably represented his State and people. When he lost the primary contest to JOHN GLENN there was no malice in HOWARD's heart. The day after his defeat he mingled in the Senate Chamber with colleagues in a relaxed and affable manner.

HOWARD is a charming, personable, articulate gentleman. He leaves the Senate just as we were getting to know him—it is too brief a relationship. I wish him continued success and a happy return to private labors. He knows how to live and people will look to him for aid and counsel.

TRIBUTE TO EDITH R. GREEN

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a privilege to join in paying tribute to our esteemed colleague, Mrs. EDITH GREEN, the gentlewoman from Oregon, who will be retiring at the end of this session after 20 years of service in the U.S. Congress.

EDITH has made a significant contribution to the legislative process; she is noted for her zeal for hard work, her thoroughness, and eloquence in public speaking. Her skills as a floor manager are legendary.

She came to the Hill with 12 years of classroom teaching experience and quickly established a reputation for herself as "Mrs. Education." She is considered responsible for the passage of the much heralded Higher Education Act of 1965 which supported Government aid to students and for the creation of the Interagency Council on Education. Her considerable efforts brought about the Juvenile Delinquency Act.

In addition, she was one of the original sponsors of medicare legislation, and has continually supported programs providing benefits for the elderly. An ardent feminist, EDITH's lobbying efforts over a period of 8 years were instrumental in bringing about the Equal Pay for Equal Work Act of 1963. Her overriding quest for peace was manifested in her stand against the war in Vietnam.

Mrs. GREEN's role in Democratic Party politics has been an impressive one. She has given her support and encouragement to Presidential candidates from Adlai Stevenson to Robert Kennedy and her commitment to political work at the community level has been a full one.

It has been both a pleasure and an honor for me to serve with her on the

December 20, 1974

House Appropriations Committee during the 93d Congress. I am pleased to hear that EDITH plans to continue in her career of public service, but I shall miss her leadership and legislative expertise here in Washington.

TRIBUTE TO ALAN BIBLE

HON. LEE METCALF

OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, there is not now nor has there ever been a Member of this body who is a better friend of the American Indian than the distinguished Senator from Nevada, the Honorable ALAN BIBLE.

As a member of the Senate Interior Committee for 18 years, and since 1969 as chairman of the Subcommittee for Interior Appropriations, Senator BIBLE played an important role in the significant strides made in recent years by Indian people.

Congress first included Indians as eligible recipients of economic development assistance enacted in the middle sixties, but since then it has become a commonplace for such authority to be incorporated in education, housing, economic opportunity, law enforcement assistance, revenue sharing and other legislation.

Long before we heard the phrase self-determination, the distinguished Senator from Nevada was doing his utmost to assure Indian people an equal opportunity with other Americans by supporting improved education and economic development funds for them. A table comparing the appropriations enacted in 1969 and in the last year of his chairmanship of the Interior Subcommittee tells of ALAN BIBLE's faithful stewardship of Bureau of Indian Affairs programs and the treble increase in money devoted to them. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the table be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD following my remarks.

We have special cause to be grateful for Senator BIBLE's determination that continued progress in Indian education not be jeopardized for want of trained Indian professionals. He persuaded the Senate to increase training funds from $6 to $15 million in 1971. In such programs next year, close to 15,000 Indian students will receive college scholarship assistance.

Indian people residing on Montana's seven reservations have cause to remember Senator BIBLE. At Busby, the Northern Cheyenne rejoice in the 20-percent increase in enrollment and the 93-percent attendance rate since tribal assumption of school operations under a BIA contract; Senator BIBLE saw to it that the agency was given enough money to cover the additional costs of running a well-attended school.

At the Rocky Boy's Reservation, the Chippewa and Cree Tribes have written hums with the activity of energetic people who have transformed education on their reservation into a model that is the constant object of study by others with similar aspirations.

Their beautiful school was built with funds appropriated by Congress while Senator BIBLE was chairman of the Subcommittee on Interior Appropriations. Engineering and architecture is under way for three other badly needed new schools on Montana's reservations.

A new jail was built at Browning, a dental clinic was constructed on the Flathead and a dental clinic at Crow Agency will be equipped with additional funds provided by Congress. There is to be a new health clinic at Lame Deer.

For these and many other improvements in the lives of Montana's Indians, I am grateful to my friend and colleague from Nevada who saw such expenditures as an investment in people an investment that would be returned many times over. Education, employment training, improved health could be the passports out of poverty. Senator BIBLE's confidence was not misplaced, for life for Indian people has improved.

During the period 1969 to 1975 over $290 million was appropriated for BIA irrigation, building and utilities construction. Approximately $100 million was for irrigation projects, while the balance of approximately $190 million has been for building and utilities, largely for school construction.

One of these is Stewart Indian School in Carson City, Nev., which has been remodelled into a safe facility. Dormitories and classrooms have been rebuilt and the gymnasium replaced.

Of the irrigation construction funds, approximately $64 million has been appropriated since 1969 for the Navajo Indian irrigation project, authorized in 1962. The project, located in the Rio and San Juan counties in northwestern New Mexico, is expected to be completed in 1980. It will place a total of 110,630 acres under irrigation and will provide livelihood for an estimated 6,550 Navajo families.

Senator BIBLE has aided in other programs, such as the Colorado River and the San Carlos projects in Arizona, the Fort Peck in my own State of Montana and the Duck Valley project in Nevada. On many Indian reservations, irrigated farming is the basic economic industry and in some areas the only industry available to the Indian residents. Because of the acute competition for water on and adjacent to Indian reservations, particularly in the arid and semiarid west, there is greater danger of the loss of water unless it is put to beneficial use.

Mr. President, I have a friend, whose name is Teddy Rising Sun, a Northern Cheyenne Indian from Lame Deer, Mont. In a recent address, Teddy spoke of the old Northern Cheyenne way of choosing leaders. He said:

A man didn't become a Chief by putting on a war bonnet. It takes a lot of living, a lifetime of living, to be a Chief.

Senator BIBLE earned the war bonnet in a lifetime of work, not talk, in behalf of Indian people.

I ask unanimous consent to insert a table in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HON. ELLA T. GRASSO

HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to join our colleagues in wishing every continued success to the new Governor of the great State of Connecticut, Hon. ELLA T. GRASSO. She will be an outstanding Governor. Here in the Congress it has been my great pleasure to serve with Mrs. GRASSO on our Veterans' Affairs Committee. I have been impressed by her great concern for the welfare of our veterans, and by her outstanding ability. Mr. Speaker, the gentle-lady from Connecticut already has achieved a magnificent record of accomplishment in the academic world and in the crucible of public service. I predict, however, that this is merely the beginning, and that even greater triumphs lie ahead for Governor-elect GRASSO.

TRIBUTE TO THE HONORABLE
ROBERT O. TIERNAN

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ROONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, my friend the Honorable ROBERT O. TIERNAN of Rhode Island will retire from this House of Representatives at the end of this 93d Congress. Before the impending sine die adjournment catches up with all of us I should like to take a moment to refer to BOB TIERNAN's almost 8 eight years of fine service to his constituents, his State of Rhode Island, and his country and to tell him how much we shall all miss him.

Bob first came here on March 28, 1967, to fill a vacancy caused by the sudden passing of one of my dearest and closest friends, the respected gentleman from Rhode Island, the Honorable John E. Fogarty, who did so much for public health and medical research as a fellow subcommittee chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, beginning with the 81st Congress on January 3, 1949.

I know that the people of the Second Congressional District of Rhode Island will dearly miss Bob TIERNAN's advice and counsel on the myriad of difficult and complex problems he solved for them. The Members of this 93d Congress will long remember Bob's record for ability and integrity.

Mrs. Rooney and I would like to join in wishing Bob TIERNAN Godspeed, good health, and unbounded success in his coming years.

HON. WAYNE OWENS

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 19, 1974

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I join with my colleagues in paying tribute to WAYNE OWENS. As you know, when WAYNE was elected to the House in November 1972, he came to us with an extensive background in the workings of the Congress. In 1969-70, WAYNE served as administrative assistant to Senator EDWARD KENNEDY while the Senator was majority whip. And from 1971-72 WAYNE served as administrative assistant to Senator FRANK MOSS.

To his constituents over these 2 years, WAYNE has been an open, candid and able leader. The citizens of Utah's Second District were indeed fortunate to have had so dedicated and conscientious a representative serving their needs.

WAYNE's contribution to the Judiciary Committee has been recognized, I am sure, by the entire Nation. He showed deep understanding of the great constitutional issues confronting each of our members; and, he demonstrated the courage of his convictions. WAYNE left a stamp upon the committee for his initiative relating to television coverage. For, it was WAYNE OWENS who first suggested we apply to the Rules Committee to request a change in the Rules of the House to allow unprecedented television coverage of meetings as well as hearings.

I will certainly miss WAYNE's wise counsel. His ability to work alongside all members of the Judiciary Committee under the most difficult times of stress contributed to our collective strength and fortitude. And, I look forward, as I am sure we all do, to working with WAYNE in the many years of public service I am certain he has ahead.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES URGING SUPPORT OF THE DAIRY BILL

HON. E. G. SHUSTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Record, I include the following:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C.

The President,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I respectfully urge you to sign the Dairy Bill (S. 4206). The evidence is overwhelming that:

- (a) Dairy farmers are receiving a lower price in 1974 than in 1973;
- (b) Their costs of production have increased approximately 20 percent;
- (c) They cannot survive for many more months. Their plight is desperate!

As many as 30 percent of America's dairy farmers may go out of business and if that happens a severe milk shortage is inevitable. The consumer will suffer and properly blame the Government for short-sighted policies.

As important as the above reasons are, there is an even more important reason for approving the Dairy Bill:

The dairy farmers and their rural neighbors are losing faith in the essential fairness of our Government.

They feel betrayed by a Government which has been knee-deep in regulating agriculture but now says "sink or swim in the marketplace" as it watches them sink.

These farm families, who work seven days a week through sun up and sun down, are among the most decent and dedicated citizens of our nation.

They stare in stunned disbelief at a Government which will not permit them a price increase of 67 cents/cw or one cent per quart (the effect of increasing parity to 85 percent) when the evidence vividly portrays their plight.

They watch throughout 1974 as:

- Federal workers get 5.4 percent increase;
- Construction workers get 10.8 percent increase;
- Manufacturing workers get 8.5 percent increase;

- Service employees get 10.2 percent increase;
- Mine workers get 64 percent increase;
- Workers displaced by the Trade Bill get 70 percent of wages;

Over $2 billion is provided to make work for 300,000 unemployed, while a small fraction of that amount is not provided to help 300,000 dairy farmers produce a vital commodity;

U.S. Steel gets 23 percent in price increases (per the Council on Wage and Price Stability);

Oil Company profits skyrocket;
Etc., etc., etc.;

and they are deeply and profoundly shaken. Mr. President, we must not turn our backs on these solid Americans. When their faith is gone, whose will be left? I beg you to see the merit of their case and act in the long term best interests of America.

Respectfully,

BUD SHUSTER,
Member of Congress.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR SAM ERVIN

HON. LAWTON CHILES

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, the departure of Senator SAM ERVIN leaves a great void in our Senate body. It is a loss that will be felt keenly by all who have known and worked with him but, more than that, a loss to the people of our Nation of unqualified experience, ability, style, and stewardship.

At age 77 Senator SAM has decided he wants to go back home to Morganton, N.C., where he and Mrs. Ervin will have more time to share the love of their hometown community and to pursue the quiet pleasures that the stress and demands of senatorial duties have not allowed them. I know of no one who has more earned it, for SAM ERVIN and his wife have given of themselves so much for so many more years than we have had a right to ask.

Senator ERVIN will no doubt be best remembered by the people of this country for his role as chairman of the Senate Watergate Committee, presiding over the televised public hearings. This was indeed an outstanding contribution, based on results achieved by the committee in reform legislation.

But his greatest gift to his country has been his diligence in guarding our Constitution, utilizing to the fullest his knowledge and wisdom.

Well known and enjoyed for his own quotable quotes, Senator SAM nevertheless frequently quoted others of note, and one of his favorites was Thomas Wolfe who offered this some time ago:

I do not believe that the ideas represented by "freedom of thought," "freedom of the press," and "free assembly" are just rhetorical myths. I believe rather that they are among the most valuable realities that men have gained, and that if they are destroyed, men will again fight to have them.

SAM ERVIN did not wait for these freedoms to be destroyed before he fought for them, but rather was in the vanguard of preservation, especially when Government seemed about to infringe and usurp power that belonged to the people.

This man has proven over and over again that he has the sensitivity and ability to relate the issues and events of the present to the basic rights guaranteed by the Constitution. The circumstances of recent times, and the efforts of Senator ERVIN have, I believe, clarified public understanding and strengthened our Nation's commitment to preserve those rights.

Senator SAM's 20 years in the Senate leave a challenge to all of us—in terms of integrity, dedication, consistency, strength of character, kindness. I have had the privilege to learn and benefit from those qualities as a member of the Government Operations Committee chaired by Senator ERVIN, and I will sorely miss him.

December 20, 1974

HON. JOHN DELLENBACK

HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, no Member of Congress is more highly respected as a man of the highest character than our dear friend, Congressman JOHN DELLENBACK of Oregon. He is a distinguished attorney, a veteran of active duty military service to the Nation, and a leader in the affairs of his church. Mr. Speaker, I have been privileged to enjoy a meaningful association with JOHN through our congressional prayer breakfast group. No one has been more faithful to the group or more important to its fellowship. Mr. Speaker, I predict for JOHN DELLENBACK many more years of public service to his State and Nation. That is certainly our hope, as we extend best wishes for his every continued success.

TRIBUTE TO WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, I certainly wish to associate myself with my colleagues in their expressions of admiration and tribute to WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN DORN, one of my dearest friends and closest associates for almost three decades.

BRYAN has been one of the great strengths of the Public Works Committee, giving every ounce of energy and drive, every bit of expertise, to such vital national programs as community development, and area redevelopment, which have helped cities and towns across this Nation achieve self-sustained growth and a better life for their citizens.

More than once, these programs have gotten through Congress by the skin of BRYAN's patience, perseverance, and dedication to assuring Americans in every part of the country a chance to earn a decent living and reach personal fulfillment through rewarding occupations in the location of their choice.

He has served with equal distinction as member and chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, working to assure justice for American service men and women who gave so much to their country in time of need.

Mr. Speaker, in my 28 years in the House I have seen perhaps 2,000 men and women pass through the halls of Congress. Many of them are only shadows in my memory; some I will remember as outstanding legislators, or as close personal friends.

BRYAN has been both to me, as we fought side by side for programs we believe in. I know he will be greatly missed by his colleagues in the House, and espe-

BRYAN, you and your lovely wife have all my wishes for health, happiness, and great personal satisfaction in the years ahead.

THE RETIREMENT OF TOM KOROLOGOS

HON. GALE W. MCGEE

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. MCGEE. Mr. President, it was with a deep sense of regret that I learned of the retirement of Tom Korologos as Deputy Assistant to the President for Legislative Affairs.

In my estimation, there has never been a finer or more capable individual to hold this position than Tom.

Tom Korologos demonstrated a special sensitivity in his working relationship with all Members of the Senate. This was due, I believe, to the fact that he served for so many years as administrative assistant and press secretary to the distinguished senior Senator from Utah (Mr. BENNETT), before assuming his White House duties in 1971. Although our friend and colleague (Mr. BENNETT) also retired at the end of the 93d Congress, I want to pay particular tribute to his foresight in bringing Tom into Government service. Many of us in the legislative and executive branches of Government have benefited greatly from that decision.

As many of my colleagues have already noted, as is oftentimes the case, a close working relationship also gives rise to close friendships. In this regard, I consider Tom a friend for whom I have a deep and abiding respect. He has always been an individual characterized by his unceasing energy, humor, and intellect, wise in the ways of the legislative process.

One of my most enjoyable associations with Tom came in the summer of 1973, when we traveled together as a part of a congressional study mission to the People's Republic of China. That trip afforded me the opportunity to converse with Tom at great length. I shall always recall that exceptional moment in my life with a certain fondness for Tom.

Tom was always straightforward in his dealings with the Senate. Not once did he ever mislead me or any other Member of this body. He served the White House during one of the most difficult times in the history of our Nation. Yet, he served with integrity and honesty, and served so very effectively in keeping the legislative program on track. This effort required an individual of highly exceptional capabilities, and Tom was more than equal to the task.

Before closing my remarks, I must mention the work Tom performed on an issue very important to me over the past 3 years. I refer to congressional action which allowed the United States to import Rhodesian chrome in violation of United Nations' sanctions against that illegal British colony. During the closing days of Congress in 1973, it was through the personal and effective efforts of Tom Korologos that a filibuster against legislation to place the United States back into compliance with sanctions was broken and the Senate was able to vote in support of the measure sponsored by my friend and distinguished colleague, the junior Senator from Minnesota (Mr. HUMPHREY). Had it not been for Tom, that filibuster would never have been stopped. I give him credit for achieving what I considered a most important victory.

Tom Korologos leaves us, but he will not be forgotten. We all lose a very valuable and highly talented public servant. Although I will personally miss him in his role as Deputy Assistant to the President for Legislative Affairs, I want to wish him nothing but the best, for Tom Korologos deserves nothing less.

I ask unanimous consent that an article written by William Chapman for the January 2 edition of the Washington Post be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

NIXON LOBBYISTS SAY HIS WOES DIDN'T AFFECT LEGISLATION
(By William Chapman)

The men who lobbied Congress in behalf of a collapsing presidency left the White House yesterday convinced that former President Nixon's impeachment troubles had very little effect on the course of legislation. "Impeachment really didn't interfere very much with what we were doing elsewhere on the Hill," recalled William E. Timmons, the former White House congressional liaison chief.

"A lot of reporters were wrong I remember [in 1973] when we lost the war powers override [President Nixon's veto of the bill restricting presidential powers], everyone was saying it was Watergate and they tried to link the two. Actually, there was no relationship at all. That was just an institutional fight between two great bodies of the government."

Timmons, who remained on President Ford's staff after Nixon resigned, officially left the office in mid-December. He and two other congressional aides who are also departing—Tom C. Korologos and Gene Ainsworth—will set up a lobbying firm for business clients in an office building a block from the White House.

The three men were President Nixon's emissaries to Capitol Hill in the turbulent times of the Watergate hearings and the House Judiciary Committee's impeachment inquiry. While those stormy events were underway, they said in interviews yesterday, routine legislation went its own routine way.

It had its funny moments, Korologos recalls, with humor now, that with Nixon's popularity sinking rapidly in the polls, there wasn't much happening on Capitol Hill that could inflict any more harm.

"People used to laugh at me. A senator would come up to me and say about some bill they'd just passed, 'You are not going to veto that one, are you?'"

"I'd say, 'You don't think it could hurt our image, do you?' When you're down to 25 percent in the polls, there's not a lot you can worry about, is there? You don't stop and worry about what the Greeks or the blacks are going to think. Actually, a lot of good government was going on in those days."

Korologos and Timmons are convinced that votes on legislation were not lost because of President Nixon's entanglement in the Watergate proceedings.

"It was tough for a while, but our problem was in keeping the legislation separate from impeachment," said Korologos. "But there weren't any votes lost because of impeachment. Everyone voted his district anyway. A military appropriations bill had nothing to do with impeachment."

Both agreed that Nixon's relationship with Congress never was exactly cozy. He never much liked making telephone calls to key congressmen, those acts of duty that President Ford actually seems to relish.

"If you put in a suggestion for Ford to call up someone, a conferee or a ranking committee member, he'll do it," said Timmons.

"Nixon was not comfortable doing that. He did some of it, of course, but it wasn't often, and when he did he really wouldn't like it. It was awkward for him. It was not his nature. Ford is comfortable doing it and he's pretty persuasive in personal negotiations."

Timmons had been in the Nixon administration from the start, one of those 1968 aides chosen to join the "transition team" at meetings in the Hotel Pierre in New York after the election.

Korologos came on the congressional liaison staff in April, 1971, and for two years was in charge of White House relations with the Senate.

The new lobbying firm will include the three former White House lobbyists and Stanley Ebner, former general counsel to the Office of Management and Budget. It will be a general Washington representational firm handling an assortment of clients from the business world.

OUR BEST WISHES TO RETIRING REPRESENTATIVE FRANK J. BRASCO

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ROONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, with this 93d Congress coming to a rapid conclusion, I would, indeed, be remiss if I did not take time out from a busy and hectic schedule, hampered by my illness, to pay tribute to a good and loyal friend, a man who has been of great assistance to me in reelection campaigns.

The people of the 11th Congressional District in Brooklyn, N.Y., and many Members in this Chamber, will miss FRANK's ability to help on many complicated and complex matters affecting the good and welfare of the average citizen. This body and the entire country at this time can ill afford to lose the abilities of a man like FRANK BRASCO.

Please forgive me if I am so brash as to predict and to feel that FRANK BRASCO will be fully vindicated of the charges brought against him in our system of laws. I earnestly hope and pray that his appeal will be successful and, if he so desires, that he be subsequently returned to his seat here in the House.

Mrs. Rooney joins me in extending to FRANK, his lovely wife, Linda, and their four fine children many, many years of good health, happiness, and success, God speed to you.

TRIBUTE TO THADDEUS DULSKI

HON. JOHN M. MURPHY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues to pay tribute to THADDEUS DULSKI, a leader of men and women, and a man who has left his indelible mark upon the Government of the United States.

There are many things that could be said of THAD DULSKI in summing up his fine career. He served his constituents and his district in the highest tradition. He served his State and was ever mindful of New York's unique needs. And he served his country—as an individual Member of Congress, and as chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee.

The Federal workers of America have much for which to thank THAD DULSKI. He reorganized the antiquated Post Office into the improved and streamlined postal service. He has improved the retirement and health benefits systems for civil servants. He has completely reformed the salary and pay raise mechanism of the civil service. His improvements to the civil service and postal service have benefited every American. Through his achievements, the most qualified employees are attracted to the Federal service and through his organization of the system, the taxpayers have been saved millions of dollars.

Until his chairmanship of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, THAD-

December 20, 1974

DEUS DULSKI served with distinction on the Veterans' Affairs Committee where his actions on behalf of this Nation's veterans are well known. And finally, we must not forget THAD DULSKI's comments to those brave people living in the captive nations of Central and Eastern Europe. His devotion to the freedom of all people has served as a beacon to those who still must fight for personal and political freedom.

To my friend and colleague, THADDEUS DULSKI, your leadership and guidance will be sorely missed. May your future be as bright as your past.

WILLIAM M. "FISHBAIT" MILLER

HON. JAMIE L. WHITTEN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I do not want the Congress to come to an end without calling attention to the services of William M. "Fishbait" Miller, who has served this Congress for more than 40 years, beginning as a youngster so skinny it is said that being from the gulf coast he was given the name of "Fishbait," a name which stuck through the years, though he has changed in appearance.

His unfailing courtesy and attention to the needs of the Members earned him steady promotion until he became Doorkeeper of the House, a title which in no way reflects the importance of his office, and where he supervised more than 300 employees with an annual payroll of more than $1.3 million per year.

He has presented to the Congress Presidents, kings, and potentates and his voice, saying, "Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States," will be remembered by the thousands he served, among them President Ford who graciously wrote "Fishbait" that in his retirement—

Pascagoula is fortunate in gaining a senior statesman of stature, and the House of Representatives is losing a friend of renown and a Doorkeeper who has given many years of dedicated service to this position.

I want to join with your many friends in wishing you well in any new endeavors you may choose to pursue. Also, I want you to know I will miss an associate and friend who has extended to me many gracious and thoughtful courtesies for almost a quarter of a century.

With warmest personal regards,

Sincerely,

JERRY FORD.

Fishbait is being succeeded in the new Congress by James T. Molloy, who though well qualified will have his work cut out for him in attaining the level of accommodation and service left by our friend, William M. Miller.

To my friend, "Fishbait," his wife, Mabel, and his fine daughter, Sarah Patsy, we extend on behalf of the Mississippi delegation, our colleagues, and his fellow employees our very best wishes for health and happiness in the years to come.

December 20, 1974

THE 93D CONGRESS WILL BE REMEMBERED FOR MAJOR ACHIEVEMENTS AND HISTORIC DECISIONS

HON. HAROLD T. JOHNSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, the 93d Congress will be remembered primarily as the Congress which gained back much of the power and delegated authority which the executive branch had assumed over the last 35 years. At its outset, the Congress and the executive branch faced a historic confrontation caused by the efforts of the President to curtail or eliminate programs and agencies which had been established legally and funded by the Congress.

Congress developed the muscle needed to regain lost power and establish for itself a greater role in the policy and decisionmaking functions of Government. Some of the most notable actions taken were the enactment of budget reform and impoundment control legislation, the war powers measure curtailing the President's authority to commit U.S. troops to war, and the reform of the committee structure in the House of Representatives.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

The Watergate affair forced upon the 93d Congress one of the most difficult responsibilities to face any Congress in the history of the Nation—consideration of the impeachment of the President. This Congress also was called upon to confirm two nominations to the office of Vice President under the provisions of the 25th amendment of the Constitution.

In addition to these major votes, the 93d Congress established an outstanding record of achievement in many other fields. So that my record is available to all who are interested, I have again, as I do at the conclusion of each Congress, listed a recap of my voting record on each of the issues which came before the 93d Congress:

SUGGESTIONS ON MEETING THE CURRENT ECONOMIC CRISIS

HON. RICHARD S. SCHWEIKER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, in conjunction with President Ford's call for Americans to make suggestions on how best to meet the current economic crisis, the staff of WWSF Radio at St. Francis College in Loretto, Pa., has written to Mr. Ford with a number of suggestions. Those associated with WWSF are to be commended for taking the initiative to share their views on this vital situation, and I ask unanimous consent that the text of their letter be printed in the Record at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

WWSF RADIO, ST. FRANCIS COLLEGE,
Loretto, Pa.THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am Host of a daily talk show that discusses just about everything, including the present economic situation. My audience has made numerous suggestions and comments on alleviating our problem which they felt also would be helpful if passed along to you.

It is rather difficult for a housewife to understand a breakdown of prices when a side of beef is used as an example. We would suggest that a six pound beef roast (eye of round, or bottom round, etc.) be used instead. You could then show how much of the cost of this beef roast goes to the grocer, the middleman, and the farmer—this would give a more accurate picture as to who may be making unnecessary profits on meat. Following this same line of thought—there are rumors in our area of grocers being forced to buy from certain warehouse owners. The middleman should be investigated to clear the picture.

Many citizens, in an effort to conserve energy and reduce their heating costs, are purchasing storm windows, insulation, new heating units, etc. They save nothing, however, when they receive heavily padded bills for these items and their installation. We also hear and are appalled by the tremendous profits the oil companies are making at our expense. Now there's talk about lifting the controls on domestic natural gas with talk of frightening increases in its cost. Many people literally must choose between starving or freezing to death. How much longer can the rape of the American public be overlooked?

Cutting the federal budget seems to get more response from our listeners than does an increase in their taxes. It's time to stop such useless allocations of government funds for; a study on the impact of rural road construction in Poland, $85,000; a dictionary of witchcraft, $46,089; a study of lizards in Yugoslavia, $15,000, etc. We also hear of the gross misuse of equipment and funds by the military. This must not be allowed to continue.

Many of our listeners believe that wage and price controls should be reconsidered. The millions of Americans earning minimum wage or a little more just can't compete with those earning $12 an hour and more. Those living on fixed incomes cannot live in a world in which only those earning $15,000 or more can live comfortably. The biggest tax burden is borne by the $15,000 or under wage earner.

Economic advisers in fairly high income brackets cannot possibly understand the family pocketbook as middle income housewives daily making ends meet can. There should be a place on the economic committees for a middle class homemaker representative and careful consideration should be given to what she or he has to say.

The majority of our listeners are not happy with the 5% surtax. There are many differing opinions on why and how it should actually be done, but there is a consensus of opinion that those who can least afford it are again being asked to bear the burden.

Other suggestions include: Those 65 to 72 should be permitted to earn as much as they can without losing their Social Security benefits or paying income tax. Permit men and women at age 62 to retire on full pension to open the job market to younger persons.

Increase the quality of our manufactured goods. It seems they last only as long as it takes to pay them off.

Cut government bureaucracy. Strict patrol of our territorial fishing waters. Investigate the kickback of big moneys to big business.

Strict enforcement of anti-trust laws. More competition would increase quality and lower prices.

Prohibit Congress from attaching riders to major funding bills. Funds are being spent unnecessarily on government programs passed merely as riders.

I'm sure this letter is not what you had in mind when you asked the American people for help. The attitude is negative, but please understand that our listeners feel they have done all they can, and now it's up to you.

TRIBUTE TO THE HONORABLE
JAMES R. GROVER, JR.

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ROONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, the aisle down the center of this Chamber divides the House of Representatives between the Democrats and Republicans but it cannot divide friends. My friend on the other side of the aisle and my fellow New Yorker is the Honorable JAMES R. GROVER, JR.

JIM GROVER was long active in many civil and community organizations following his graduation from Columbia Law School, including the Lions Club, the Knights of Columbus, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and other veterans organizations.

The people of his part of Suffolk County, N.Y., obviously recognized his ability and talents for in 1957 they elected him to the New York State Assembly and subsequently in 1962 elected him to the Congress of the United States.

Here in this Chamber, JIM has made his mark as a conscientious, articulate, hard-working Congressman who holds at the center of his attention the best interests of his constituency. The people of the Second District of New York have responded to his effective leadership by electing him to six Congresses.

Mrs. Rooney joins me in wishing JIM and his lovely wife Mary and their family many years of happiness, good health, and success.

CLARK FISHER

HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, my distinguished colleague from Texas, CLARK FISHER, will be leaving the Congress this year, having served in the House for 32 years. He is a highly respected Member of this body and we all hate to see him leave.

CLARK has served as a member of the powerful Armed Services Committee with distinction for many years, heading one of its most influential subcommittees. He has consistently voted for a strong national defense and has played a major role in formulating our defense posture during the past quarter century.

CLARK FISHER is a great American and this body will miss him. I join my colleagues in wishing for him continued good health and happiness.

DR. FLOYD M. RIDDICK

HON. LEE METCALF

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, when Tennyson talked about parliaments of man, he equated it with the end of the throbbing of war drums and the beginning of the era of law. The field of parliamentary law is therefore most significant in any organized society. In the Senate we rely on the Parliamentarian to guide us and instruct us in the law of our regular procedure.

Dr. Floyd M. Riddick has been our Parliamentarian and given us his expert guidance and counsel on our deliberative proceedings. He has been fair and impartial, the rulings he has made were based on a long line of precedents and the rules of the institution we represent. On our desks in the Senate and in our offices is the most authoritative text for procedure and usage in the Senate: "U.S. Congress; Organization and Procedure," by Doc Riddick. I hope in his semiretirement he will have time to annotate and include precedents that have arisen since he published the last volume.

I make the last comment because, while

I understand that Doc Riddick has retired as Parliamentarian with the adjournment of the 93d Congress, he will continue to make his services and his background and knowledge available to the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration.

Doc Riddick has always been a supporter of the concept of thorough information for the Members of Congress and those who follow congressional activities. Hence, it was Doc Riddick who thought that there should be a Daily Digest of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It was his idea in the 1940's that a capsule comment on proceedings in Congress would be useful in reading the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The first Digest appeared in the Record of March 17, 1947. Today it is the first item to which we turn.

Doc Riddick, a scholar, an innovator, a lawgiver, has made a tremendous contribution to the Senate and thus to parliamentary bodies everywhere. I wish him well on his partial retirement, and I am pleased that he will still be around for counsel and advice on the complex procedures of the Senate.

TRIBUTE TO EDITH GREEN OF OREGON

HON. ANCHER NELSEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. NELSEN. Mr. Speaker, in the years that I have been involved in Government and the legislative process, I have never known a more effective, courageous and fair person than EDITH GREEN of Oregon.

Her influence in the House of Representatives has been very great, and it has been a thrill for me to work with her on several bills where we felt agreement was important.

In my mind, EDITH has made a finer contribution in the field of educational law than any other Member of Congress, past or present. Her record here in many other respects is worthy of greatest praise and emulation.

It has been a real pleasure for me to serve with EDITH, and I want to wish her every happiness in her well-deserved retirement.

THE NEED FOR REFORM OF THE REGRESSIVE SOCIAL SECURITY TAX

HON. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the following editorial from the December 15 issue of the Milwaukee Journal on the social security system, entitled "The Social Security Squeeze" to the attention of our colleagues.

For many of the same reasons mentioned in the editorial, I decided this past March to cosponsor H.R. 13384, legislation which would ease the financial hardship experienced by low- and middle-income taxpayers, in the form of the regressive social security tax. This legislative proposal would redistribute the impact of the present tax on the income scale, thereby putting more money in the pockets of the working people during this time of severe inflation, while at the same time lowering the cost of doing business for employers. Specifically, this bill would cut the payroll tax from its present employer-matched 5.85 percent to 3.9 percent and increase the wage base subject to the tax from the current $13,200 to $25,000.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation represents a reasonable compromise between those who fear or oppose any change in the social security system and those who would finance it entirely from general funds.

Finally and most important, Mr. Speaker, this proposal reflects an effective and responsible way for Congress to ease the financial burden of the average workingman while continuing to assure minimum financial security for our senior citizens and thereby should receive serious consideration during the 94th Congress.

The editorial follows:

THE SOCIAL SECURITY SQUEEZE—I

Tax reform is dead for this session of Congress. Perhaps, it is a blessing in disguise, because the bill that died in the House Rules Committee was a quickie measure designed more to score political points than to achieve comprehensive reform.

In fact, the patchwork bill completely ignored one of the greatest tax inequities: the Social Security payroll tax. Its reform should be a prime goal of the new Congress, convening next month.

The Social Security tax, paid in equal amounts by the worker and his employer, usually is not considered in tax reform discussions. Yet it grossly violates the principle of progressivity that supposedly governs our tax structure.

Because the tax is a flat rate on a given initial portion of a worker's income, it is a regressive levy. Increasingly burdensome for low and middle income workers. Wisconsin's Sen. Nelson pointed out last year that "recent increases in the payroll tax—at a compound annual growth rate of more than 17% since 1949—have largely eliminated the tax relief Congress attempted to extend to these groups in 1964, 1969, and 1971." It is estimated that 50% of today's workers pay more in Social Security taxes than income taxes.

Next year a worker will pay $824.85, or 5.85%, of his first $14,100 of income. It can be argued that, in effect, the worker is paying close to double that percentage because his employer's contribution is made at the expense of wages or fringe benefits that might otherwise go to the worker, or is reflected in higher consumer prices that the worker must pay. Yet for incomes over $14,100 the effective percentage of the tax drops as income rises.

Unless some steps are taken to alter the current manner of financing Social Security or the amount of benefits the system pays, this regressive burden will grow. Social Security is a pay-as-you-go fund. Workers' contributions today pay the benefits of those now retired. Persistent inflation automatically triggers increases in benefits, increasing the cost to be borne by the work force. Moreover, if births continue at their current low rate, the ratio of retired to working population will increase suddenly and dramatically after the year 2000—and so will the cost of Social Security. By 2025 the combined percentage tax levied on employer and employee could almost double (see chart).

On the other side of the coin, the Washington Post pointed out in September that Social Security benefits have increased over the last five years at a much higher rate than the consumer price index. And there is little indication that Congress has lost its penchant for viewing a Social Security benefit boost as a golden goose in an election year.

There is an urgent need to look now—not later—at alternatives to the present financing and payment structure.

SENATOR STEVENSON HONORED AS ISRAEL BOND "MAN OF THE YEAR"

HON. ADLAI E. STEVENSON III

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, on Sunday, December 15, 1974, I was honored as the Israel Bond "Man of the Year" in Chicago. I ask unanimous consent that the text of my speech be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be included in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY SENATOR STEVENSON

I am honored by the generous recognition you have accorded me and glad for an opportunity to express some thoughts about the future of Israel.

This is the final night of the Festival of Hanukkah—a season of hope. I want my remarks to be in keeping with the spirit of the season. I want also to be thoroughly candid with you about what we read in the headlines from the Middle East—and what we read between the lines.

So, tonight I sound three notes: a note of sober, even somber, realism; a note of earnest caution; and a note of genuine hope—even confidence—that Israel, which has endured many storms, will survive another, and soon prosper in peace.

This gathering is a testament to the inspiration Israel holds, not just for those of the Jewish faith, but for millions of others in the world.

Israel is a testament to the power of the human will to triumph over adversity and cruelty.

Israel symbolizes the righting of terrible wrongs—and so, it touches our memories and the conscience of us all.

The flowering of modern Israel is a testament to man's persevering genius—his economic, technological, scientific and democratic genius. Israel has made the desert bloom and the human spirit flourish.

So, in Israel more is at stake than the future of one small nation; more is at stake than the pride of its friends and supporters. In Israel the honor of a generation is at stake. History will not deal kindly with a world that fails to help this small, free and courageous nation to prosper and to live in peace.

It would be foolish tonight to ignore the storm clouds that hover over Israel.

At a time when the United States should be speaking with one voice in support of Israel, the highest ranking officer of the United States armed forces, General Brown, has sounded a discordant note. In one interview, he questioned the loyalty of American Jews to the United States. In another, he saw fit to question the judgments at Nuremberg.

For these lapses, the President thinks General Brown should merely be reprimanded.

I think he should have been reprimanded—and then removed.

Even more seriously, we see tonight an eclipse of principled leadership in the world—most tragically in the United Nations.

The U.N. in recent days has passed resolutions that defy both realism and justice.

Humanitarian relief programs have been perverted into cynical tools of political reprisal.

And we have seen the saddest spectacle of all: the General Assembly, which once was a council of peace, sounding an ovation for a terrorist.

In 1961 my father, speaking from his seat in the United Nations, warned against the day when the actions of the United Nations might be meaningless—because no one would take them seriously: a day when raw power might overwhelm international morality. If that day came, he warned, the true victims would almost certainly be the small and developing nations newly coming to independence.

Now his words seem sadly prophetic. For these dismal events in the United Nations do not so much threaten Israel as they threaten the United Nations itself. Already the United States Senate has voted to withhold funds from UNESCO until it ceases its politically motivated behavior.

It would be tragic if the United Nations, still the fragile vessel of our hopes for international cooperation and world peace, should sink still lower in the esteem of civilized humanity.

So, let those nations who, having sought an international forum and then abused it, show some restraint—or finally destroy the frail vehicle upon which rides much of mankind's hope.

Still other, more immediate, dangers are on our minds tonight.

The people of Israel find that some battlefield victories bring, not elation, in their wake, but trouble: bitterness and recrimination, now inflation; burdensome taxes and economic recession.

The friends of Israel watch with growing anxiety as Russia rearms her Arab clients—and as the Arabs, the P.L.O. and Iran included, unite within a fortress built of oil.

Israel's fate hangs upon the thread of supplies and support from the United States. And now the resupply of Israel is complicated by logistical uncertainties in the Azores and elsewhere.

The patient efforts of Secretary Kissinger to approach a settlement step by step have been threatened, if not doomed, by the recent Arab summit in Rabat.

All these somber facts point to the danger in the Middle East that war will erupt anew. Some say that Israel cannot countenance the growing unity and continuing rearmament of the Arab states or the new status of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Some say that with the Syrian disengagement agreement less than six months from expiring; with the Arabs gaining unity and strength, the Arabs may be reaching a point where they will not show restraint—and so Israel is reaching a point where it cannot show restraint.

Some are counseling war in the name of peace. In short, some who call themselves friends of Israel are counseling a preemptive strike: arguing that Israel must attack upon some provocation to buy time and—perhaps with support from the United States—invade Arab oil fields and break the back of the oil cartel.

So here I strike my note of earnest warning: There may be appeal in such bold and simple ideas—in such forceful notions about ordering human affairs. But there is also great danger.

The great danger is that things will give way and the center will not hold. The wise will lack strength and the passionate intensity of the extremists will carry.

Already the statesmanship of Prime Minister Rabin is under assault from more militant citizens in Israel.

December 20, 1974

December 20, 1974

Arab moderates are beleaguered and living under the threat of assassination.

Yasir Arafat, ringed by zealots even more extreme than he, feels compelled by an Israeli reprisal in Beirut to applaud murder in Tel Aviv. The danger is great that the voices of moderation may be silenced by zealots—and the patient work of peace obliterated by war. This past week the spiral of terrorism took another tragic turn in Tel Aviv and Beirut.

This is a time to sustain and support the leadership of Prime Minister Rabin. He is guided not by dreams of conquest or revenge, but by a clearer perception of reality.

A preemptive strike by Israel, he knows, would be followed by an oil embargo against all the major oil consuming nations. Such a strike, however much disguised, would forfeit U.S. support for Israel, and cause world depression.

The Prime Minister is wisely speaking of flexibility: of talks rather than war; of the political process rather than preemptive strike. He needs and deserves our support against those immoderate who, like Samson, would bring down the temple upon our heads. And now, real hope.

For I see light beyond the clouds on the horizon.

There is, in the air of both Israel and the Arab states, also in Moscow and Washington, a new breath of realism, born of the horror war can bring, a new willingness to conciliate opposing views.

Israel has bravely and forthrightly accepted a new austerity so that it can carry both the burdens of its people's needs and the national defense.

Despite the new status conferred upon the Palestine Liberation Organization at the Arab summit in Rabat, Arab moderates still have the upper hand. There is some hope that the P.L.O. may now be subjected to new restraints and moderating influences. Now the P.L.O. has status to lose, as well as to gain, by irresponsible demands and violent tactics. The Soviets appear to be exercising a chastening influence—and we should bear in mind that Arab moderates are by no means enthusiastic about the prospect of a Palestinian state ruled by Yasir Arafat.

Secretary Kissinger's efforts may have been set back—but that does not mean that war is imminent, or that continued conflict is the unending destiny of the Middle East.

No, I believe the future holds more hope than that.

I do not believe that the United States should accept the P.L.O. as spokesman or agent for the Palestinians.

I do not believe that the U.S. should pressure Israel to do so.

For until the P.L.O. renounces terrorism and acknowledges Israel's right to exist, Israel has nothing to negotiate with the P.L.O.

But history—even recent history—has taught us that today's impossibilities can become tomorrow's possibilities.

Our hope tonight—a hope which deserves our prayers and our tireless efforts—is that a more promising future can be built in the Middle East out of a process of negotiation that includes all parties who are willing to renounce violence and accept the right of Israel to exist. Such a process is possible and could lead to a settlement of all the tangled issues that plague the Middle East; a settlement that would be guaranteed by the great powers—and finally, a settlement that would justify restraint and concession by Israel and its neighbors.

I am hopeful because I am confident of the continuing support of the United States for the State of Israel, the people of Israel—and the idea that is Israel.

The U.S. will remain Israel's steadfast friend and supporter. Israel will justify and guarantee U.S. support by its reason and its commitment to a peaceful settlement of its disputes.

We are not about to sell Israel for a barrel of oil.

Any relaxation of the U.S. commitment to Israel's security and integrity would encourage the Soviets and the Arab states to believe that their ends could be achieved by force. I do not expect that relaxation to come because I do not expect Israel to invite it.

Adversity is not new for Israel and for people of the Jewish faith. They have overcome much in the past and must overcome much again. But I believe more deserts will bloom in the Middle East. And this time, in peace.

The times are dangerous. But they are also hopeful. You can hear, amid the uproar of men and nations, the flutter of wings, the gentle stirrings of life and hope. In the heat of fear and conflict new ideas and a new spirit may come into this world, as gently as doves.

Let us look at Israel's achievements—and take heart for her future. Let us look—and work—toward the day when peace comes, and then we will gather to look back to this time as the time when the process of peace was started; when the walls began to fall; when men learned once again to esteem reason and brotherhood.

For that to happen will require high statesmanship. It will take the understanding and the humility of which the prophets spoke. It will take preparedness and firmness. It will take your continued support and mine—and the support of all the American people. It will take leadership in America which acts from a clear recognition of our moral obligation and true self-interest in the Middle East—leadership that is not deflected by weariness or the whims of private interests or the fitful currents of opinion. But given that support, the elements of a settlement are there to be put together by wise and persevering and moderate men.

So let us work to make it happen. And as we do so, let us pray, in the words of the young Solomon, "Lord, give Thy servant an understanding heart."

Shalom.

THE PASSING OF FORMER REPRESENTATIVE EUGENE WORLEY OF TEXAS

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ROONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is with a heavy heart that I mourn the passing of not only a distinguished former colleague, a brilliant Federal judge, but a very good friend, the Honorable Eugene Worley of Texas. Gene's departure after a long illness brought to a close a career of great accomplishments by one of the ablest Texans I have known.

From 1935 until 1940 Eugene Worley was a member of the Texas Legislature, at which time he resigned, having been elected to the U.S. House of Representatives for the 77th Congress. Gene and I worked together here in the House from June of 1944, when I became a Member, until President Harry S. Truman appointed him in 1950 an associate judge of the U.S. Court of Customs and Patent Appeals. The great caliber of the man is dramatized by a story told about Gene regarding his appointment to the court. President Truman wanted to appoint him to the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, which is a trial court. Gene did not feel that he was qualified to be a judge in a trial court. As the result President Truman did not appoint him to that court but to the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals because Gene felt he was qualified for such a court. It was reported that President Truman was both amused and delighted by Gene's honesty and frankness.

Judge Worley's abilities were further recognized when in April 1959 President Dwight D. Eisenhower appointed him Chief Judge of the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals. During his tenure as Chief Judge Gene made many improvements in the court's procedures. Our association did not at all end with Gene's appointment to the bench for in the ensuing years our subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee had the responsibility to consider and decide the budget requests for the Federal Judiciary.

In June of 1972, Judge Worley assumed senior judge status and on last Tuesday passed away. Long after our words take their place in the permanent CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the memories of our association with Gene Worley will remain. We shall indeed miss him. Mrs. Rooney and I extend our deepest sympathy and condolences to his lovely wife, Ann, to his sons and daughter, and to all his family.

VICE PRESIDENT'S LONG SUPPORT FOR ATLANTIC UNION

HON. PAUL FINDLEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, the day the House confirmed the nomination of Nelson Rockefeller to be Vice President of the United States, I stated how I first became aware of his long support for Atlantic Union when I read his book, "The Future of Federalism" in the early 1960's.

Actually, the Vice President's support for Atlantic Union predates the publication of this book by almost a quarter of a century. In 1964, then Governor Rockefeller was awarded the Atlantic Union Pioneer Award, together with William Clayton and the Earl of Avon. In his introductory remarks, Clarence Streit, the author of "Union Now" and president of Federal Union, recited Governor Rockefeller's long support for Atlantic Union. The following is the text of Mr. Streit's comments followed by those of Governor Rockefeller:

COMMENTS BY MR. STREIT AND GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER

Mr. STREIT. We are honored indeed to have with us the third of our Atlantic Union Pioneers. To my personal knowledge, Governor Rockefeller's interest in Union of the Free goes back at least 25 years. I well remember when I first met him. The time was a few months after Union Now appeared in early 1939; the occasion was a small luncheon of 15 or 20 persons arranged by one of our supporters—as I recall, the hostess was the late Mrs. Thomas W. Lamont Sr., the mother of Dr. Austin Lamont of Philadelphia, who is in the audience, a member of our Board who has done much to make our Convocation a success. The place was, appropriately, at the Rainbow Room level of Rockefeller Center.

December 20, 1974

The first fruits of that luncheon were not long in coming. It happened in this way: Soon after our organization was set up on a nation-wide basis in July, 1939, it was torn by a dispute, of a kind which I feel sure the Atlantic Union will face in its formative period, namely, where shall the capital be? The two strongest "states"—I mean chapters—in our organization were New York City and Washington, D.C. Each sought to have our national headquarters in their city. Both were highly important to us, the former as the publicity and financial capital of the country, the latter as its political and diplomatic capital. I wanted to have our capital in both—but we lacked funds to pay the rent.

EARLY ROCKEFELLER HELP RECALLED

This dispute was settled by Nelson Rockefeller, without his knowing the danger we ran of being split in two by this issue. Governor Rockefeller was then in charge of filling Rockefeller Center with tenants, and in the process took up a number of unexpired leases in other buildings. One of our supporters told him of our need for office space, without my knowledge, and then informed me that Nelson Rockefeller offered us a whole floor at 10 East 40th Street, rent-free until a paying tenant could be found. That settled the question of where our capital would be—and in a way that gave our movement new confidence and courage, and a good midtown address.

Governor, you have doubtless long forgotten this good deed. I have never mentioned it to you since, or made it public before—although I have mentioned it off-the-record to some friends in mass media who, after your Harvard lectures on "The Future of Federalism," expressed doubt as to the depth of your interest in the subject. But I think the time has come for the public to have this proof that your Federal Union thinking and action go back at least 25 years. I should add that you showed no haste in seeking a paying tenant for that floor; we occupied it from January 1940 for more than two years before it was leased.

In the years that followed we had several talks in which you affirmed, ever-more strongly, your belief in our basic principles, although you could not make this public because of the official positions you then held. Let me mention but one of these encounters. It was in 1945, at the Charter Conference in San Francisco. You were then Assistant Secretary of State for Latin American Affairs. In company with our then Pacific Coast director, Edgar Bissantz, I called on you in your offices in the St. Francis hotel. At that time, when official U.S. policy and public hope were centered on the United Nations as adequate for preserving peace, you were among the few who understood that the U.N., to succeed in this mission, needed to be supplemented with an Atlantic Federal Union. We were both heartened to hear how forcefully you set forth to us our own views on this point.

I jump now to February 1962 and your Harvard Lectures. These came to me as a very happy surprise for two reasons. First, I had no inkling of them until I read the press reports; we had fallen out of touch and I had assumed that you were all absorbed with state and national politics since becoming Governor. Secondly, your three lectures on "The Future of Federalism" came at a time when other U.S. political leaders and many of our best friends in Congress were afraid even to mention such words as "federal" or "union" in connection with Atlantica, lest they arouse controversy and opposition from misguided "patrioteers."

This led some of the ablest and most influential leaders in the Atlantic Union Committee to persuade its Board that the only way to get Congress to authorize the proposed Atlantic Convention was to eliminate the words, "federal" and "union," from the earlier resolution, and otherwise water it down. I opposed this view as strongly as I could, but was in a small minority, and this strategy was followed.

Congress approved the weakened resolution in 1960 and in January 1962 the Atlantic Convention had met in Paris. The upholders of this strategy had hoped that, by thus avoiding coming to grips with the basic issue in Congress, the battle could be fought in more favorable conditions in the Convention. But instead of its tackling the matter in depth for at least several months, as they had planned, the Convention was affected by the fears that had fattered the resolution's weakness. It ended, after sitting only 10 days, with a Declaration that recommended leaving the task to another body, a "Special Governmental Commission"—and avoided such words as "federal" and "union" as the plague.

In these conditions, Governor, you can imagine how happy we Federal Unionists were to find you, only three weeks after the Atlantic Convention adjourned, devoting three statesmanlike lectures to "The Future of Federalism," and boldly beginning the final one, on its international future, with these words:

"The federal idea, which our Founding Fathers applied in their historic act of political creation in the 18th Century, can be applied in this 20th Century in the larger context of the world of free nations—if we will but match our forefathers in courage and vision."

We were still happier at the response that followed—we who had always maintained that the best way to win support for Atlantic Union from the American people was for statesmen of your stature to present it to the public in the tested, trusted terms of American history. You told me later, when I came to express our appreciation, that some of your advisers had shared the fears that ruled so many then in Washington and had expected the heavens to fall—but that you could not recall receiving any criticism, only warm support from all over the country in letters and editorials. Let me quote two of the latter. The San Francisco Chronicle wrote:

"When the leading prospect for Republican nomination to the Presidency urges that the U.S. join the nations of Western Europe in a 'union of freedom,' something of far-reaching significance has evidently happened. . . . It is heartening that a Republican who wants to lead his party and his fellow citizens does not fear or hesitate to express these thoughts."

The Washington Post ended its lead editorial on your third lecture thus:

"This is a very powerful appeal to the American people as well as to our friends abroad. Presumably Mr. Rockefeller is staking his political future on a 'grand design' that reaches far beyond what is customarily heard from candidates for political office. . . . He has eloquently challenged free peoples everywhere to arise to a new concept of their destiny."

More significant still were the fruits that your pioneering soon bore. On the 4th of July of that same year you had the satisfaction of hearing President Kennedy speaking to the Governors Conference from the entry of the historic shrine, Independence Hall, which adjoins this very building—make his famous call for a "Declaration of Interdependence" with our Atlantic allies. Almost a year later, speaking in Frankfurt, Germany, he was sufficiently emboldened by the response to your lectures and to his own 4th of July speech, to say, "In the far future there may be a new great union of us all." That was the first time any President of our great Union had used the word, union, in relation to Atlantica.

HARVARD LECTURES BORE AMPLE FRUIT

A few months before, in April, 1963, former Vice President Nixon had proposed "expanding NATO from a purely military alliance to a political confederation" as the "only" solution. On July 10, 1963, former President Eisenhower in answering Lord Avon's question on Telstar, as I pointed out earlier, made his first public commitment to Atlantic federation as the "final objective."

Last Autumn your party formed its "House Task Force on NATO Unity" under the inspiration of Congressman Paul Findley of Illinois—who is seated now in this House where the First Congress met, and who made at our luncheon today a forthright, eloquent plea for immediate action to federate Atlantica. In May this Task Force's chairman, Congressman Albert Quile of Minnesota, sent President Johnson its proposal that he name a "blue-ribbon" delegation, headed by former Presidents Eisenhower and Truman, to meet in a convention with similar groups from other NATO nations to recommend measures to make NATO "more durable and effective . . . economically and politically, as well as militarily."

In July the substance of this proposal was endorsed by your party's platform which declared it to be "a keystone of Republican foreign policy to revitalize the Alliance." Earlier, in January, Senator Goldwater had taken his plunge in favor of Atlantic unification. In his acceptance speech he evoked "the flowering of an Atlantic civilization" as "a truly inspiring goal for all free men to set for themselves." And on Oct. 2, speaking in Peoria—where Federal Union held its third Convention in 1943—the Senator declared that, if elected, "one of my first acts will be to initiate a call for a North Atlantic conclave . . . to create a North Atlantic Community united in spirit, purpose and action." All this without any audible outcry, by my knowledge, from even his most nationalistic supporters.

Such has been the avalanche, of ever-accumulating force, set off by the stand you alone among political leaders had the courage to take in February 1962. It was the more courageous since, as many of us here today remember well, the Senators of your party voted in 1960 two to one against even that watered-down Atlantic resolution I mentioned. Here was pioneering that was not only very courageous but very effective.

What you have already done, Governor Rockefeller, gives us Federal Unionists more than hope for the future; it gives us great confidence. In the words of Ralph Waldo Emerson to Walt Whitman on first reading his Leaves of Grass, "I salute you at the outset of a great career!" I rejoice to present our Atlantic Union Pioneer Award to:

Nelson A. Rockefeller, dauntless trail blazer of union of the free, forceful upholder of the faith that we can bridge the Atlantic now with "the Federal idea," if we "but match our forefathers in courage and vision."

Governor Rockefeller, Clarence and Mrs. Streit, Dr. and Mrs. Baker, Ambassador Allen and Mrs. Rockefeller, I feel that in this historic legislative chamber I should address you as Your Honorable Body.

Ambassador Allen has really brought to light in the most dramatic way the tremendous historical significance of this Hall in terms of the constitutional and legislative life of our great nation.

And as I have sat here and shared with you the moments and the images and the glimpses of the past which he recreated, one cannot help but see in perspective the significance of what Clarence Streit has been doing; the significance of the goal to which he has dedicated his life.

I feel very strongly that we should have been giving him the award tonight, rather than having been one of the beneficiaries of your generosity. However, I am deeply honored by the company—the Earl of Avon (formerly Sir Anthony Eden) and a man whom I admire deeply, Will Clayton—in receiving this award. I think, perhaps, it is more an evidence of the responsibility which we hold to help contribute to achievement of the reality of this goal to which Clarence has dedicated his life.

I couldn't help think, though, as we recreated the days of the original Constitution, that in my office in Albany I sit facing a picture of the first Governor of the State of New York, a predecessor, Governor Clinton, who at the Constitutional Convention in New York State fought for six weeks to oppose the ratification of the Constitution.

The Constitution might never have become a reality had it not been for Alexander Hamilton and his efforts, dedication and brilliance, who started with a two-thirds majority against him in the New York Convention, but who, with this complete dedication, with this vision and understanding of the portent of things that lay ahead, and with the Federalist Papers which had such a tremendous impact, was able to swing that Convention and bring New York in line.

So perhaps our start in New York State belies a little of the generosity of today. But perhaps we can make up for lost time.

I can't help thinking of the early days before the war when Will Clayton came to Washington in 1940, motivated by this same devotion, this same dedication to which Clarence was referring. He came down because he was worried about what was happening in the world. And as a man of initiative and imagination and leadership, he wanted to see what he could do to help. This is where I had the pleasure of meeting him first.

We joined together and worked for four years in the Office of Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs. We then went together to the State Department where he was Secretary for Inter-American Affairs.

Then, at the Conference in San Francisco, as you mentioned, Clarence, of course Anthony Eden was representing his country. I had the privilege of working with him there.

In those five years, working with the western hemisphere, trying to pull together and bring about the requisite understanding and ability to face the potential dangers in this hemisphere, as well as in Europe, it became very clear to me the tremendous capacity that people across national frontiers have to work together, if they can only find the way of creating a framework within which their common objectives and aspirations can be achieved.

I feel very deeply that after the war we missed an opportunity, which we took strong hold of in Europe—that of carrying forward the possibilities of common effort of free men, working together.

But today in many respects we face in the Atlantic Community—and in the free world as a whole—the circumstances which the newly free colonies had met—in this environment right here.

Much can and must be done.

I would like to thank Clarence for the award, but far more importantly thank him for what he has done, the way he has held together this concept in America and Europe during this 25-year period. And now perhaps, with the forces of disintegration which are seen on all sides—I say "perhaps," but I have confidence that it will come about—we in this country and the nations in Europe will take the steps leading to the federation of the Atlantic Community as a first step to the federation or union of free people for the realization of those goals for which our Founding Fathers gave their lives.

Mr. STREET. To close this ceremony, let me read the opening of a favorite poem of mine, which expresses the feeling that has inspired our Awards tonight. The poem is by Walt Whitman, who once lived across the river from here, in Camden, New Jersey. To me he is the world's greatest poet of individual freedom, of union too in all its varied forms, and of the pioneering spirit which made the American people politically, socially, industrially and in other ways.

Come my tan-faced children . . .
For we cannot tarry here,
We must march, my darlings, we must bear the brunt of danger,
We the youthful sinewy races, all the rest
on us depend,
Pioneers! O pioneers!

THE POCKET VETO OF THE SURFACE MINING BILL

HON. LEE METCALF

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 20, 1974

(The following statement is printed by unanimous consent of the Senate obtained on December 20, 1974.)

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I regret that President Ford has seen fit to pocket veto the surface mining bill. He chose the most unjust and unfair way to perform his constitutional duty on this subject.

The Senate bill, S. 425, was passed by the Senate more than a year ago in the 1st session of the 93d Congress. The House bill was passed comparatively early in the 2d session. Almost 100 hours of meetings between the representatives of the two Houses in conference took place before the election recess in mid-October. At that time, all provisions of the bill were resolved except for the question of the surface owners rights against the Federal Government in cases where there was divided ownership of the surface and subsurface rights. Therefore, since mid-October President Ford and his advisers have known the specific provisions of the legislation. Had he been forthright with the Congress, he could have fired the bill right back with his veto before adjournment and given Congress a chance to override and permit the industry to get on with the business of mining coal.

Instead, President Ford delayed and delayed until time ran out, and from the press accounts, made some vague statements about inflationary impact and increase of Federal spending.

Mr. President, the problem of control and regulation of strip mining is a varied one. The geographical and geological differences between the various areas of the United States are tremendous. Congress must pass legislation that is the minimum, the floor, the least common denominator for this Nation. The arid lands of the West, the rich topsoil country of the Middle West, the steep hills of Appalachia are only examples of the variations. We are blessed with coal seams as much as 150 feet thick in Wyoming.

In other areas the coal seams are but 2 or 3 feet thick and the coal miner must crawl on his stomach to recover the coal. We have coal of varying degrees of sulfur content and equally varying degrees of energy generated—Btu content.

I have suggested only some of the problems presented. Areas of low rainfall and spare soil raise questions of adequate reclamation; in other areas reclamation is feasible with application of technology presently existent.

I mention these questions because they are only illustrative of the tremendous national problems incurred in the consideration of strip or surface mining legislation. These and other related problems were considered during long hours of hearings, discussions in mark-ups, and after floor debate in both Houses and the marathon conference under the leadership of the conference, Chairman MORRIS UDALL.

President Ford hesitated about sending his veto message to Congress before adjournment because obviously he knows so little about strip mining. When he says that the bill will increase Federal spending and contribute to inflation he is flying counter to an independent estimate of the Library of Congress upon the economic impact of the bill. The Library of Congress concluded that the Federal spending for the administration, enforcement, and research under the bill reported by the conference and passed by both Houses of Congress would have an "essentially negligible" impact on the Federal budget.

Of course, the utilities are building a case for themselves when they allege that the environmental costs will increase the cost of electricity to consumers all over America. This is just not true. There are dozens of studies that demonstrate the reclamation costs are infinitesimal when considered in the overall production costs. The huge increased profits of the coal companies presently engaged in strip mining prove this. The coal companies can easily pay for increased environmental costs out of their exorbitant profits and their utility customers need not increase the cost of electricity one-tenth of 1 cent per kilowatt.

During the course of working out the surface mining legislation, I have tried to keep in touch with the desires of the executive department and with representatives of the coal industry. The industry representatives were helpful in working out the original legislation and in the compromise version of the conference bill. But there were industrial representatives who were completely dishonest about the impact of the bill and the amount of coal affected. The National Coal Association has been especially guilty in this regard.

For example, the National Coal Association alleges that the passage of the Surface Mining Act would prevent the mining of 119 million tons of coal per year. This was similar to a figure issued by the Department of Interior earlier last year. Upon challenge Interior modified its estimate to suggest that 14 to 38 million tons of production might be curtailed. Even this estimate is suspect in view of the administration's own Bureau of Mines estimate of much more limited impact. But the National Coal Association continues to release false and misleading figures.

The American Mining Congress claims that the bill would result in an unintended moratorium of as much as 30 months upon the opening of new mines. As a practical matter, this objection ignores the provision for a Federal regulatory program where a State does not submit satisfactory provisions for licensing, regulation and reclamation. Moreover, Senator JACKSON and Congressman UDALL both pledged early corrective action if the fears of the American Mining Congress were realized.

Actually, President Ford's veto will result in delay of coal production. Had he signed the bill, the Secretary of Interior could have gone forward with plans for leasing of Federal lands for coal production. If, during the interval between now and the time Congress can act on surface mining legislation in the next session, there is widespread leasing of Federal lands without provisions for restoration or reclamation, without licensing or supervision, or set aside of lands that cannot be reclaimed and preservation of essential lands for higher uses than coal production—then President Ford will have bowed to the wishes of greedy men, the despoilers and profiteers, without consideration of the results of such mining upon the forests and mountains and prairies and streams of America. How a President who has viewed the ravishment of Appalachia can permit it for the rest of America is beyond me.

On the other hand, if Federal leasing is deferred until Congress can act in the next session—and that is now to be preferred—then the delay upon coal production that the President and the industry has deplored will be further extended.

In the meantime, it is incumbent upon State legislatures in coal-producing States to pass legislation regulating surface mining for State and private property in the upcoming sessions early in 1975. It will be a matter of high priority and great urgency for the 94th Congress to send to President Ford as soon as possible strong and effective legislation governing Federal leasing and permit the coal mining industry to proceed with the development of our great national coal resources with a minimum of damage to our other natural resources.

HON. JOEL T. BROYHILL

HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, JOEL BROYHILL has rendered superb service to the Nation and to the entire National Capital region. Through more than two decades of service in the Congress, JOEL BROYHILL became known as a Congressman's Congressman. As a member of the District of Columbia Committee for many years he has had a highly significant role in the development of Washington as one of the world's most impressive capital cities. And as a senior member of the Ways and Means Committee.

JOEL BROYHILL brought tremendous business expertise and commonsense to this crucial committee's deliberations. For many years, Mr. Speaker, JOEL was my Congressman, as he has been for countless other Members of Congress who establish homes away from home in his district. Mr. Speaker, we wish for JOEL BROYHILL the very best always and every happiness in the future.

TRIBUTE TO JOHN BLATNIK

HON. ANCHER NELSEN

OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. NELSEN. Mr. Speaker, one of those retiring from the House of Representatives this year about whom I want to say a particular word of praise is JOHN BLATNIK of Minnesota's Eighth Congressional District.

JOHN and I served together in the Minnesota State Senate many years ago, and were good friends at that time. Our friendship has extended on through our service here in the Congress of the United States.

During JOHN's service in the Minnesota Legislature and in Congress, his attention to the problems of his district has been so extensive and excellent, he has commanded support not only from the people of his party but from many Republicans as well. All have recognized JOHN's dedication to the area he has represented. Certainly, JOHN has been a great congressional leader, particularly in his conduct of the business of the House Public Works Committee.

It is a pleasure to have shared JOHN's friendship over these years, and to have worked with him in trying to resolve problems affecting our State. I hope to see JOHN back home from time to time now that we are both retiring. And I want to take this opportunity to wish him and his delightful family every happiness in the years lying ahead.

HON. TOM GETTYS

HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, today it is a special privilege to pay tribute to my colleague from South Carolina, TOM GETTYS. TOM has devoted his entire life to public service. For more than 40 years TOM GETTYS has been helping others. He started serving his fellowman as a school teacher in the Depression years following graduation from our great ARP institution, Erskine College, in my congressional district. He was himself an accomplished athlete and coached football and molded character and sportsmanship among his beloved youth in that and other athletic activities. He served as a school principal and emphasized education in the basic fundamentals with particular emphasis on discipline and love of country.

TOM served our Nation with distinction and honor in time of war. Following World War II he was administrative assistant to Congressman James P. Richards. You will recall that Congressman Richards became chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee during a critical era in American history. Later, Mr. Richards was appointed roving ambassador to the Middle East by President Eisenhower. Congressman Richards' rise in power and esteem in this Congress was largely due to the devotion, skill, and energy of TOM GETTYS.

TOM GETTYS was postmaster of his hometown of Rock Hill, studied law at night, passed the bar exam and became a renowned and able attorney at law. In the years before becoming the Congressman from the Fifth South Carolina District, TOM GETTYS was active in his church, veterans' organizations, Rotary, YMCA, United Fund, and served his great community at every opportunity. He was president of Rock Hill Chamber of Commerce and chairman of the board of trustees, Rock Hill School District No. 3.

In my 26 years in the Congress I know of no Member more genuinely loved than TOM GETTYS. His personality and sense of humor were contagious. We loved to see him around and felt better when "TOM was there." As a member of the Banking and Currency Committee he made a significant contribution to national fiscal responsibility. He was extremely dedicated to sound money and our private enterprise system. Our banking and lending institutions are better because of the outstanding service of TOM GETTYS.

TOM is a congressman's congressman. On the House Administration Committee he helped to make Congress a greater, more responsible institution as it served the American people. On that great committee TOM GETTYS was not for reform just for reform's sake, but he worked diligently to make Congress more responsive to the needs of the people during a period of change.

TOM GETTYS had no superior in Congress for exceptional service, dedication, and devotion to the people of his own congressional district and they in turn loved him. He looked after his people with compassion, affection, and diligent concern. He made his hometown a model city. As a result, Rock Hill is rapidly becoming one of the most beautiful and progressive cities in the United States. His entire district is indeed "blossoming and blooming like a rose" with watersheds, water projects, highways, conservation, and new industry.

TOM married a wonderful lady, Mary Phillips White, of Chester, S.C. She is due much of the credit for the remarkable success of her accomplished husband. Mary Phillips is from a distinguished South Carolina family which includes the greatest football player South Carolina ever produced, the late Dode Phillips. Congressman (and Mrs. Gettys) have two lovely daughters, Julie Martin and Sara Elizabeth. This close knit and wonderful family has cooperated beautifully as a team in serving the people of the Fifth District.

Mr. Speaker, this is a better Congress, ours is a greater Nation, and the cause of freedom around the world more secure, because of the leadership, dedication, and devoted service of our great statesman, TOM GETTYS. Mrs. Dorn and my children join me in wishing for TOM and his charming family every continued success, much happiness, and the best always.

HON. THADDEUS J. DULSKI

SPEECH OF
HON. BARBER B. CONABLE, JR.
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 18, 1974

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join in paying tribute to our good friend and colleague, THADDEUS J. DULSKI of western New York, on the eve of his retirement from Congress. TED DULSKI has met his responsibilities in Congress with good sense and good humor, both highly desirable attributes in this environment, and I regret that he is not remaining here with us longer.

TED has been in Congress 16 years, much of that time as chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee. There has been much concern about reform of our institutions during that period. As chairman, TED DULSKI presided over one of the major reforms of a Government institution: That was the dissolution of the Post Office Department and establishment of the U.S. Postal Service as an independent Government agency to provide the Nation's mail service. The verdict on the success of this reform remains undecided at this point, but this does not diminish the responsible and effective leadership that TED gave to this significant effort to revitalize the Nation's postal service. It remains for others to follow his lead and to implement successfully this new direction for Government service.

I know TED DULSKI will continue his interest in Government, will continue to contribute to his community. We all appreciate his contributions here, his friendly personality, his realistic perspectives. I join in wishing him continued success, enjoyment, and good health.

GENE AINSWORTH

HON. L. H. FOUNTAIN
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 18, 1974

Mr. FOUNTAIN. Mr. Speaker, I was sorry to learn that Gene Ainsworth is planning to leave the White House Congressional staff at the end of this year. Gene has done an outstanding job at the White House and those of us in the Congress, who have had occasion to be in touch with him from time to time, fully realize what an able man he is. We will miss his cheerful willingness to help.

Knowledgeable about Capitol Hill long before he went to the White House, Gene's dedication to duty, ability, integrity and and experience combined together to make him exceptionally useful and successful in his work for the executive branch.

I want to wish Gene well in whatever he may undertake in the days to come. Well done.

DAVID T. WILENTZ: AN OUTSTANDING NEW JERSEYITE MARKS HIS 80TH BIRTHDAY

HON. HARRISON A. WILLIAMS
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this month an outstanding and beloved citizen of my State, David T. Wilentz, marked a great milestone in his life when he celebrated his 80th birthday. I want to join with a veritable legion of friends and admirers in congratulating Dave and wishing him well.

Dave Wilentz has been a leading figure in government and politics in New Jersey, and in the Nation, for four decades. He served as attorney general of New Jersey for 10 years, longer than any other individual. It was at the beginning of his tenure, in 1934, that he became a national figure as prosecutor in the trial of Bruno Richard Hauptmann, the man ultimately found guilty in the Lindbergh kidnapping case.

As leader of the Democratic organization in Middlesex County, and as chairman of the New Jersey State Democratic Committee, Dave had a profound influence on the political and governmental life of our State. There was never any mystery about the secret of his political success: Dave believed that the best politics was doing a good job in government. He always inspired worthy and talented people to run for public office, and he insisted that, once elected, they truly serve the people. The county government in his own Middlesex County has always been among the best I have ever encountered in providing all of those services that a government is created to provide.

Mr. President, I have known Dave Wilentz throughout my political life, and I have counted his friendship as one of life's greatest fortunes. My feeling of respect for him is profound, and Mr. Williams and I treasure very greatly the friendship we have with Dave and his entire, wonderful family.

Mr. President, an editorial congratulating Dave Wilentz on his 80th birthday was published in the News Tribune of Woodbridge, N.J., and I ask that it be printed at this point in the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

WILENTZ AT 80

A legend in his own time, David T. Wilentz today marks his 80th birthday.

Born humbly, his life has been the literal translation of another legend—the American dream.

His career took him into law and thence into politics, in the process making him sometimes by chance but always by ability, a national figure and a major power in the Democratic party.

David T. Wilentz established and guided the future of untold numbers of rising politicians and other public servants without once in his life ever running for any elective office.

His career centered into the vortex of a tornado around the Lindbergh kidnapping case at a time when the Nazis were flexing their muscle. Bruno Richard Hauptmann, who was convicted of the crime, was a German and Wilentz a Jew.

Under his desk for years he kept a sackful of the hate mail he received from German sympathizers while he was prosecuting Hauptmann and while a governor of the state made every effort possible to have Hauptmann's death sentence commuted.

In his 80th year he remains a man of incredible acumen and activity. He has not retired and probably has given little thought to such a prospect.

He has never lost the common touch, has never stopped giving of his time, talent and energy to community projects beyond the scope or capacity of many men half his age.

At 80, as an example, he is actively involved in the administration of the Middlesex County Blue Badge Association No. 1, serving as its chairman.

Those who have known his respect and appreciate his friendship and guidance.

Expressing the sentiment of himself and others, Sen. Harrison Williams said that he has known David T. Wilentz throughout his political life and "no person has had greater good fortune in life than to have the friendship of that man. Beyond political associations, that friendship has been one of the most personally rewarding that I have known, treasured most completely by my wife and me alike."

On behalf of all his friends, this newspaper extends its best wishes.

THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FELICIAN SISTERS IN AMERICA

HON. FRANK ANNUNZIO

OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, the year 1974 marks the completion of 100 years of service in America by the congregation of the Sisters of St. Felix, a Franciscan community of women devoted to teaching, health care, social work, missions, and para-apostolic work.

The work of the Felician Sisters in America began with a small band of five Sisters who came from Cracow, Poland, in 1874, and settled in Polonia, Wis., to begin the task of setting up facilities to help the new immigrants to America make the difficult transition to life in a new land and a new culture. The Sisters began their service by devoting themselves to teaching and caring for orphans.

In the century of dedicated service to the communities in which they lived and to humanity in need the Sisters expanded their work and their membership from that original group of 5 to almost 5,000 American Sisters. The Felician Sisters are now engaged in education from preschool through university and are active in the medical care field, in homes for senior citizens, and in day care centers. Their ministry extends to the aged, the poor, and the disadvantaged in the inner city as well as in underdeveloped countries. They direct houses of prayer, novitiates, and work with diocesan and parish organizations for liturgy, catechetics, vocations, and mass media.

The 604 Sisters of the Chicago province alone, which includes the States of Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Alabama, staff 52 institutions which include 2 hospitals, 2 homes for senior citizens, 1 day care center, 3 high schools, 2 of which are in Chicago, 43 elementary schools, 25 of which are located in the Chicagoland area, and one 2-year college. Felician College and Good Counsel High School are located in the 11th Congressional District on Chicago's northwest side, which I am honored to represent.

The Sisters of St. Felix's splendid and brilliant record of achievement is one of dedicated and devoted service, full of love for humanity—a record of excellence combined with compassion for the rejected, the disadvantaged, the disabled, and the helpless.

I send my congratulations to the Sisters of St. Felix in the Chicago area and all over this Nation on their centennial anniversary of outstanding achievement and extend to them my warmest best wishes for their efforts as they continue their ministry and expand their work for the betterment of all mankind.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR AIKEN

HON. LEE METCALF

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, Senator AIKEN's last days in the Senate were typical of his distinguished career. He achieved his legislative objective of an Eastern wilderness bill. He went out as he came in, a devoted and dedicated advocate of the use of the people's land and forests and lakes for the benefit of all America, and his last accomplishment was extension of concern for the land of America.

Senator AIKEN was an agricultural philosopher in the tradition of the great leaders from New England and the Middle West from the beginning of our history to the turn of the 20th century. He was a champion of the small farmer. Probably more than any member of the Agriculture Committee over his long period of service he was aware of the dangers of corporate agricultural growth. This awareness gave him insight into the complexities of the western range and the western farms, vastly different from the agriculture of his native New England but alike in basic principle.

His interest in the problems of the individual farmer coupled with his dedication to improvement of agricultural methods made him the ally of modern agencies of agricultural progress.

He was a lineal as well as a philosophical descendant of his predecessor from Vermont, Senator Justin B. Morrill who authored the Land Grant College Act when he was a Member of the House of Representatives. Senator AIKEN was a longtime friend of the Agriculture Extension Service. He worked in behalf of agricultural research; he led in promotion of the introduction of new plants, of new species, of innovative programs. Yet in the field of foreign affairs the Yankee homespun philosophy of Senator AIKEN was a welcome contrast to some of the members of the striped pants school. His pragmatic and commonsense approach has been invaluable to the people of America.

Senator AIKEN was a nationally known nurseryman before he came to Congress. He was especially proficient in the cultivation of wild flowers, a sophisticated specialty that is beyond the reach of all but the most skilled horticulturists.

Now that he is retiring I know that he will return to tilling the soil. The inflationary trend will force him to use his skills in growing potatoes and turnips and other vegetables to help the family budget but I hope he will find a spot on his farm in Vermont for a few wild flowers and he may even again be one of the few nurseries in America from which one may obtain the bitter root, Montana's State flower.

All good wishes to Senator AIKEN and to Lola in their retirement. They have earned the gratitude of all Americans.

CONGRESSWOMAN EDITH GREEN

HON. ELFORD A. CEDERBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. CEDERBERG. Mr. Speaker, I consider it a great personal honor to add my very best wishes and thanks to Congresswoman EDITH GREEN on the eve of her retirement from the U.S. House of Representatives. Perhaps the highest honor we can pay is to state that EDITH will be sorely missed from this great body.

At a time when we read and hear more about the need of candor and openness in our political system, I say that Congresswoman GREEN has set that example for years here in this Chamber. She was and remains very candid; you knew exactly how she stood on the issues; and one could have great faith in her legislative presentations on very complicated and complex subjects.

EDITH, during her 20 years in Congress representing the Third District of Oregon, became the foremost expert on education matters. She has been appropriately called the "mother of education." Yet, while in support of Federal assistance for education, she always stressed the need for local, regional, and statewide authority over the programs.

For 18 years, EDITH was a moving force on the House Committee on Education and Labor, serving as the chairperson of the Special Subcommittee on Education. But in this Congress, she felt that powerful and important committee to join our House Committee on Appropriations.

For a so-called "newcomer" on the majority side, no one performed better than EDITH. As the ranking minority member of Appropriations, I quickly found out how effective and great EDITH GREEN was in dealing with complicated legislative matters. My respect and admiration for her became even greater.

I shall miss her fine contributions to our committee work in the next Congress as well as her straight-forward and understandable presentations during debate on the floor of the House.

We shall all miss EDITH. But, the biggest loser will be our country. EDITH GREEN was a great Congresswoman and a wonderful lady who cared about her country's people and their educational needs. And, because of her dedication and work, our country's educational accomplishments are assured in the years to come in making this a better place to learn and live.

I thank you EDITH for our friendship over the past 20 years. I wish you the greatest possible happiness and good health in the years ahead.

HAROLD E. HUGHES—A MAN FOR HUMANITY

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, there is one common failing among the Members of this body. It is a tendency to routinely apply to ordinary beings the descriptive adjectives of "distinguished," "devoted," and "dedicated."

Yet, I can think of no words that more aptly describe my friend from Iowa, Senator HAROLD E. HUGHES. Last September our colleague announced his personal decision to retire from the Senate and to devote his life for religious service. This decision was received by those who know him with regret and admiration. In his tenure as a three-term Governor of his State, and one Senate term, HAROLD HUGHES has compiled a record of accomplishment and understanding that surpasses the normal concept of duty and public service.

When he came to the Senate, some columnists jokingly confused his name with that of a billionaire recluse. But through his booming voice and bold initiatives, HAROLD HUGHES quickly established his own identity as a pillar of integrity and a tireless toiler in the cause of humanitarianism. It has been my privilege to have served these past 6 years with the Senator on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

He has provided reasoned leadership in formulating much important social welfare legislation. As chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Alcohol and Drug Abuse, Senator HUGHES was the driving force behind the Comprehensive Alcohol and Drug Abuse Act of 1970 and its subsequent amendments. This humane legislation recognizes that problems of drug abuse can best be solved through health service rather than through law enforcement. Today, thousands of troubled humans are receiving proper medical treatment and counseling to overcome their abuse of alcohol, instead of receiving repeated sentences to jail cells and the clogging of court calendars.

Senator HUGHES has been a powerful and persuasive voice in the issues of world peace and humanitarianism. As a member of the Armed Forces Committee, he revealed and righted excesses of military power. He has a genuine concern for human values and the desire to serve mankind. His ability to sway others on a righteous course has been demonstrated.

I recall when we traveled together to my home State of West Virginia for three meetings in Clarksburg and Elkins, where he held the hearts of the audiences. There are constituents who continue to comment on his inspiring appearances.

Now he has left us. HAROLD HUGHES has gone from this Hill. He has chosen to follow the call that he is convinced will move him to greater service for humanity. We will continue to benefit from his dynamic presence in this Chamber. I believe the Nation is the better for his Senate career.

THE MORTALITY RATE OF ABORTIONS

HON. EDWARD I. KOCH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Speaker, an often used argument used by persons opposed to granting the right of abortion to women has been that the operation is a dangerous one, and for this reason should not be performed. Experts have consistently reported that this is not so, and that when performed under medically sound circumstances, the mortality rates are lower than for most other operations. The Center for Disease Control, in an April 1974 report shows a .32 per 10,000 mortality rate for legal, medically performed abortions. Below is a table from the September 1973 Scientific American article, "Surgical Intervention," listing postoperative mortality statistics for 1969:

Operation	Number of operations	Number of deaths	Deaths per 10,000 operations
Tonsillectomy without adenoidectomy	68,127	2	0.3
Ligation and division of Fallopian tubes	18,195	1	.5
Partial mastectomy	70,692	52	7.4
Abdominal hysterectomy	107,860	220	20.4
Appendectomy	100,846	355	35.2
Radical mastectomy	15,119	61	40.3
Prostatectomy, transurethral	54,413	893	164.1
Open reduction of fracture	56,343	2,672	474.2
Partial gastrectomy	16,834	975	579.2
Resection of colon	18,975	1,607	846.9
Exploratory laparotomy or celiotomy	19,139	2,542	1,328.2

When abortions are performed as a routine medical procedure during the first trimester, maternal mortality is reduced approximately 50 percent, to 0.17 deaths per 10,000.

In sharp contrast to this, Mr. Speaker, mortality and complication rates are high when abortions are nonmedical or self-induced. After the passage of the 1970 New York statute legalizing abortion, maternal mortality in New York City sharply declined. The New York City Department of Health contrasted maternal deaths from abortion prior to legalization with the rate following availability of legal abortion. This chart follows:

Year:	Deaths per 10,000 procedures
1969 (prior to legalization)	5.3
1970 (abortion legal in July)	4.6
1971	2.9
1972 (lowest ever recorded)	2.6

Mr. Speaker, these statistics are impressive.

FEA AND INDEPENDENT REFINERS

HON. LEE METCALF

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, on November 18, the Subcommittee on Budgeting, Management, and Expenditures heard testimony from independent refiners who uniformly urged immediate adoption of a plan to give independents a fair share of price-frozen crude oil. The Federal Energy Administration, after months of inaction finally adopted a sharing plan on December 4, 1974. The regulations appear in the Federal Register of that date.

Our subcommittee will continue to monitor the FEA and its management of this important program. We will be particularly concerned with any steps taken by the FEA or the Energy Resources Council, which oversees the work of FEA, to change the program to the detriment of independent refiners. We will also examine closely steps being taken by the administration to assist independents in the northern tier of States which have traditionally relied on Canadian crude oil. The Canadian Government continues to impose a heavy tax on exports of crude oil shipped to these northern tier refiners and has recently announced plans to phase out exports of crude oil altogether in the next several years.

The hearing record shows that the newly established FEA failed to address the serious problems of independents for many months and thereby provided inefficient and ineffective management. While we are pleased that, following our hearings, FEA did finally adopt the sharing plan, although belatedly, we earnestly hope that the compelling testimony at these hearings will act as a continuing spur to the FEA to take all necessary action on a more speedy and efficient basis to assist the vitally important independent segment of the petroleum industry.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of an FEA press release relating to this matter, and a statement by the Honorable Donald S. MacDonald, Minister of Energy of Canada, be printed in the RECORD following these remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEA ADOPTS REGULATIONS DESIGNED TO EQUALIZE CRUDE, FUEL OIL COSTS

The Federal Energy Administration has adopted final regulations on its "Old Crude Oil" Entitlements Program, designed to substantially equalize costs of crude oil for U.S. refiners and to bring the costs of the principal imported fuel oils more into line with those of domestic products. The regulations will appear in the Federal Register on Dec. 4.

The regulations are substantially the same as the regulations proposed by FEA on Nov. 7. They are intended to enable independent refiners and marketers who depend heavily upon high cost crude to remain competitive with those having lower crude costs.

The entitlements program will allocate low-priced "old" oil proportionately among all refiners, thus significantly reducing cost disparities that have existed between refiners with access to "old" oil, and those who have had to depend on more costly domestic (new) and foreign oil.

The regulations also cover imported distillate (home heating and diesel) oil and residual (industrial heating) oil, and will lower the price of imported fuel oil to make it competitive with lower-priced domestic products. Refiners and marketers who depend on imported products for their supply have had difficulty selling their higher-priced imported fuels. This is a particular problem on the East Coast, where over 75% of the country's refined-product imports are used.

Under the program, cost differentials will be reduced through the issuance of "entitlements" to refiners and importers which grant them access to price-controlled "old" crude oil. "Old" crude represents about 40% of the total national supply, and the average price ceiling for old oil is approximately $5.25, compared with over $10 for domestic and imported oil not subject to price controls.

Each month, FEA will establish a national average ratio of "old" crude supplies to crude runs to stills and imported products. All refiners will be issued entitlements equal to the national average ratio with additional entitlements being issuable to small refiners. Refiners with less than the national average ratio will then sell entitlements to "old" crude and refiners with more "old" crude than the national average will have to buy entitlements in order to process the "old" crude they have.

Refiners and other importers of distillate and residual fuel oil will also be issued entitlements to "old" crude, which they may sell. The only substantial change in the final regulations from those proposed Nov. 7 involves the value assigned to a barrel of imported fuel oil.

In the November 7 program, the value was placed at the difference between the average imported price and the average domestic price. It was determined, however, that due to the complexity of the market, the average prices would be too difficult to compute. Also, the imported and domestic prices for residual fuel were nearly equal, so entitlements to residual fuel would be virtually worthless. FEA determined, however, that the East Coast's heavy dependence on higher-priced imported residual oil had resulted in the price of domestic residual oil being raised to imported levels, thus causing the East Coast to bear a disproportionate share of the higher world prices for petroleum products.

In order to reduce cost differentials, FEA has assigned a fixed value to the entitlements for both distillate and residual fuel oils. They will be worth 30% of the per barrel of crude runs to stills entitlements value. Thus, if the value of an entitlement is set at $6 and old oil represents 40% of the total national supply, the entitlement value of each barrel of crude runs to stills would be $2.40. Each barrel of imported distillate or residual fuel oil would receive 30% of this entitlement value or about 72%.

Crude oil entitlements will be based on a refiner's actual crude runs, rather than refinery capacity.

If, for example, 70% of a major refiner's runs for a month were old crude, and the national old oil supply ratio was 40%, the refiner will have to buy oil entitlements equivalent to 30% of its total refinery runs for the month from refiners who had under 40% old oil, and who therefore had access entitlements.

Every month, FEA will determine the national old oil supply average and publish a listing showing the number of entitlements issued to each refiner and eligible importer.

FEA would also establish a price or price range at which the entitlements must be sold, with reference to the difference between the price ceiling for old oil and free-market prices for new and imported oil.

FEA will publish its first crude oil entitlements list on January 10, covering the month of November. All required entitlements must be bought by January 31, and the transactions reported to FEA by February 10, 1975. The program will follow the same time schedule for each succeeding month.

Small refiners, under 175,000 b/d capacity, will receive a proportionately greater number of entitlements than larger refiners. The smaller the refiner, the larger the number of extra entitlements. This is intended to compensate small refiners for their higher operating costs and proportionately greater capacity expenditure requirements.

STATEMENT BY THE HONORABLE DONALD S. MACDONALD

In February 1973, I announced that the National Energy Board would hold a public hearing "in order to provide opportunity for interested parties to be heard as to the appropriate methods for protecting the public interest in respect of oil exports over the longer term." After preparatory work, notice of the Board's hearings with respect to this matter was given on July 5, 1973, and companies and interested groups were asked to file briefs with the Board by October 15. Subsequently, the Board held hearings in Calgary, Vancouver and Ottawa, terminating on May 2, 1974. The Board, after carefully considering all submissions, testimony and argument presented, set out its findings in a report to me in the matter of the exportation of oil which it submitted under Section 22 of the National Energy Board Act. Under Section 23 of the Act, reports of the Board made under Part II may be made public with the approval of the Minister and having regard to the importance of this report, I decided that it should be made public so that all Canadians may be aware of the oil supply and demand outlook in Canada and of the need to take further action with respect to oil exports.

The Government accepts the Board's finding that steps should be taken to reduce exports of oil with a view to providing additional protection for Canadian requirements. To this end, the Board intends to modify immediately its licensing procedure.

The Government accepts the Board's recommendation for a new export control system. However, in view of the impending requirements for the Montreal market, I intend to seek early consultation with the producing provinces with a view to reducing exports more sharply than under the Board's recommended formula. The Board allocated 250,000 barrels per day (BPD) for the Montreal market from 1975 onward, but proposed that these supplies be declared surplus to Canadian requirements—and therefore eligible for export—until the Montreal line comes onstream in 1976. I intend to discuss with the provinces the advisability of "shutting in" these supplies beginning in mid-1975, rather than considering them surplus to Canadian requirements for export purposes until the line is completed in 1976. This would result in a reduction of exports to a level of about 650,000 BPD for the latter part of 1975, compared to an export level of some 800,000 BPD that would otherwise be in effect.

Evidence produced before the National Energy Board during its hearing and its appraisal of this evidence indicated an inevitable decline in producibility of indigenous crude oil commencing next year and continuing in the 1980's when frontier oil and larger quantities of oil sands output are expected to become available. Based on present supply and demand trends, there is a forecast deficiency in supply to the domestic market served by Canadian oil in early 1982, which would grow to 200,000 barrels a day by late 1983. In the face of this prospect, the Board decided to adopt a new procedure to determine the level of oil exports based on a formula by which the volume of crude oil available for export licensing during a given year will be related to oil producibility, demand for Canadian use, and a conservation expectation as estimated for that year. The volume of oil exports thus computed would be reduced by a factor which would become more severe as the estimated period of self-sufficiency decreased.

The Government decided against an immediate and complete discontinuance of oil exports because cessation of exports would provide for sufficient producibility for only a few months additional to that provided by the phased reduction of exports approved by the Cabinet. That is an immediate halt to export would extend sufficient deliverability for about two and a half years while the Government's decision to phase down exports in line with the Board's recommendations will extend the period for about one and a half years.

As I stated, it is my intention to seek consultation with the producing provinces with an aim to extending this period to two years by beginning the phase-down of exports next year and in 1976.

An immediate halt to exports would be disruptive to Canadian-United States trade relations. It would deprive certain northern U.S. refineries and their communities of the Canadian crude oil that they have traditionally relied upon.

In Canada, a sudden and complete reduction of current exports would deprive industry of a major source of cash flow required to find the higher cost reserves of the frontier areas. It would also idle a portion of the capacity of producing facilities which have been financed over the past few years. There would be a major impact on the income of the oil-producing provinces, on the oil-service industries, and a major effect on Canada's foreign exchange.

In adopting its new procedure, the Board will identify the volume of allowable oil exports for a period of at least one year, but annual average levels will be adjusted to account for immediate supply and demand factors by issuing monthly export licenses, as at present. Hearings will be held periodically to receive evidence with respect to the potential producibility of Canadian oil, the domestic demand for indigenous feed stocks, and the effects of conservation on Canadian consumption and surplus.

While the Board is forecasting that by 1982 there will not be enough crude oil production in Canada to meet the Canadian market demands which are now served by Canadian oil production, plus 250,000 barrels a day for Montreal, this outlook can be altered not only by the Board's proposed export control formula, but also by greater attention by all levels of government and by all citizens to conservation measures in the use of energy. The federal government will announce this winter a series of programs designed to conserve all forms of energy.

In 1960, when the federal government launched the national oil policy, the export level was about 100,000 barrels a day. By 1970, exports had risen to 670,000 barrels a day. The rapidly growing deficiency in the United States in the early years of this decade created a sharply increased demand for Canadian crude and exports rose to the 1.1 million barrel a day level by 1973 when the Government instituted export controls. This control system has enabled the Government to reduce exports, which for 1974 have averaged 900,000 BPD.

By the 1980's, we can expect a resurgence in production as the frontier areas and the oil sands are opened up. At the same time, our capability in nuclear energy production will also become very significant. Thus the energy supply outlook for the long term is promising. The challenge before us is to maintain a high degree of self-sufficiency in the intervening years. The new regime of oil export control that I have announced today is designed to attain that objective.

THADDEUS J. DULSKI

HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, I want to join my colleagues in paying tribute to a great Member of the House, my good friend, the distinguished gentleman from New York, THAD DULSKI.

THAD has been chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee since 1967. He has done an outstanding job, and without question, is one of the most knowledgeable people in the country concerning the Federal Establishment.

The veterans of our country are proud of this great man. He is a man of compassion and has received numerous awards from veterans' organizations and others in recognition of his great work on the House Veterans' Affairs Committee. As a member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I have personally witnessed his outstanding service to our veterans, and the service he has rendered will be greatly missed.

Everyone admires THAD DULSKI because he is a good man. I have been privileged to know him, and am proud he is my friend. Mrs. Dorn joins me in wishing for THAD continued good health and happiness.

REDUCE THE FISCAL YEAR 1975 BUDGET

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, the President has proposed that the fiscal year

December 20, 1974

1975 budget be reduced by about $4.6 billion.

Despite the proposed cuts, the Federal deficit is expected to reach $9 billion due to the worsening problem of recession.

I do not question the wisdom of reducing Federal spending. However, there seems to be room enough to cut wasteful and unnecessary spending without slashing our vital efforts in health, food assistance, and medical care.

The President's proposals would also result in the loss of about 50,000 jobs in the private and public sectors.

These suggested cuts would hit hardest at those most burdened by inflation and unemployment. For example, the President has directed that the purchase price of food stamps be increased to the limit allowed by law, 30 percent of monthly household income.

He has requested that the Congress permit Federal contributions to medicare inpatient hospital services be cut by $465 million this year, and by $1.3 billion in the coming fiscal year.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that the ends do not always justify the means.

BILL TIMMONS AND GENE
AINSWORTH

HON. JACK EDWARDS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 18, 1974

Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in paying tribute to two gentlemen who we will surely miss in Government service, I am, of course, speaking of my good friends, Bill Timmons and Gene Ainsworth.

Bill, in his capacity as the President's Assistant for Congressional Relations, and Gene, as Bill's associate have made numerous contributions toward a harmonious interrelationship between the legislative and executive branches of Government. They were well schooled by their service in the Congress, and they made use of their great knowledge as they moved to the White House.

I appreciate very much their outstanding service in their respective capacities and I know I am among many who will miss them in Government service.

I wish them well in whatever they do. They have much to offer in the private sector.

TRIBUTE TO THE HONORABLE
ELLA GRASSO

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ROONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to praise a lady who very shortly will be making history when she takes her oath of office as the first woman Governor of the State of Connecticut and as the first woman in the 200-year history of the United States to acquire a State House on her own. The lady I speak of is, of course, the distinguished gentlewoman from Connecticut, the Honorable ELLA GRASSO.

The term "gentlewoman" I use to refer to ELLA GRASSO is required under our parliamentary rules. During the time we have served together in this body I have found ELLA to be not only a capable and effective legislator but also a lovely and charming lady of the House blessed with a keen mind and ready wit.

The coming loss to the House of Representatives, which will be significant, is the tremendous gain for the people of the State of Connecticut. The real gain, however, is the American political system because it has the integrity and courage of ELLA GRASSO working within its framework. The American political system sorely needs the lady-like vitality and spirit that ELLA brings to public life.

ELLA, her husband Dr. Thomas A. Grasso, and their children, have the sincere wishes of Mrs. Rooney and myself for many years of happiness, good health, and success.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, the nuclear generation of power at Duke's Keowee-Toxaway project in my congressional district came in just the nick of time. With national fuel shortages, mining problems, and mounting consumer concern it is a relief to know that the third nuclear unit of this mammoth development will be in operation in January 1975.

In fighting for this great project several years ago, I emphasized the future need for power. Also, Mr. Speaker, I emphasized the tax advantages to our people from this great private power complex.

Oconee County, at one time one of the poorest counties in the United States, will receive in excess of $3 million in tax revenues from this project in 1975. This money will go into the county treasury. A substantial amount will also go to Pickens County. Additional tax revenues will go to the State as well as the Federal Treasury.

To those in the Congress and throughout the country who fought for this great project, I submit the following article by Mr. Jerry Alexander which was published in the Anderson Independent, a great daily newspaper located in my congressional district:

GOLD POURS ON OCONEE
(By Jerry Alexander)

Oconee County found its pot of gold this past week—the arrival of a check for over $2.6 million dollars in tax revenues from Duke Power. The $2,670,614.27 amount is staggering to the imagination of this country boy.

The big moment has been anticipated for several years. In fact, ever since the first word was given that something approaching 700 million dollars were to be invested in the hillsides of rural Oconee and Pickens counties. The announcement captivated the imagination of thousands, some who had never even heard of the concept of nuclear-powered electricity. Ocooh, look at the tax money it will mean.

So, now that the construction phase of the project is approaching its end, and production has begun, Oconee's coffers are at last beginning to swell with the tremendous amount of tax dollars.

Although the actual sum received is not as much as some people predicted several years ago, it's still a lot of "moolah" by any standard.

Ever since the initial announcement, Oconee officials have been planning what to do with this windfall—and rightly so in most cases.

There were a lot of needs in Oconee and still are.

To name a few would be to point out the educational and medical needs, a new county jail, debts to erase, better pay for law enforcement officers and a lot more bonafide ones. Better roads form still another need.

But let's face it, folks, we're talking about a big hunk of money when we say $2.6 million skins.

Especially when you realize we were doing pretty good, or thought we were, before we ever even heard of this possible windfall.

The point is that if a fellow is already making a fairly good living, getting along as happy as a dead pig in the sunshine under the circumstances, why can't he save at least a little of a sudden inheritance.

I say again, I know there are needs in Oconee that should be met, and it's going to be the decision of the new county council how these will be met. But I don't see why some of this money cannot be stored away for a bad winter like even a lowly squirrel plainly knows to do.

This is something that the people of Oconee County will want to keep in mind over the next few years.

In all fairness, it should be pointed out that the incoming county council had no hand in the present budget which runs through June. They will be, however, responsible for the budget beginning in July of 1975. The present budget was drawn by the last legislative delegation.

And another thing. Even if it does take all this additional money which dropped into the county treasury Tuesday, we've still got more money promised over and above that. It's the tax money from the third nuclear generator that will probably be on the tax books in 1975. The taxes could be in the treasurer's office the last day of 1975.

One estimate is that the third generator could bring in from a half million to three-quarters of a million more dollars. Added conservatively to the expected $2.6 million in 1975 from Duke, that would make at least $3 million or more.

And, folks, barring hell or high water, Oconee can count on about that much or more every year from here on out.

This is not to even mention other federal monies such as Revenue Sharing, Better Communities Act funds, or Appalachian grants that may come our way over the years.

This column is not to criticize at this point but is intended to remind the citizens of Oconee that we are beginning to reap the "bonanza." With this harvest will come the responsibility, to all the people and not just the leaders, to see that it is used wisely.

And if I may dream a little, I'd hope to see some of this money put away, like the squirrel keeps his acorns from the cold chills of the winter snow. Wouldn't it be great if we could save and invest, say half a million of these dollars every year for the next 10 or 20 years . . . I hesitate to even think what benefits we could eventually reap.

TRIBUTE TO REPRESENTATIVE

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ROONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, at the impending sine die adjournment of this 93d Congress the New York State delegation will lose one of its most effective Members with the retirement of Representative BERTRAM L. PODELL.

BERT PODELL served his State of New York and his country long and well in a number of important positions in the New York State Legislature. He held important chairmanships of the Joint Legislative Committee on Corporation Law and the Assembly Committee on Local Finance. He came here in the 90th Congress on February 20, 1968, in a special election to fill a vacancy caused by the resignation of my friend, the Honorable Abraham J. Multer to become a learned justice of the supreme court of the State of New York. He was then overwhelmingly elected to the next three Congresses.

BERT has been my friend during his service here. He has always been in the forefront of the programs for the benefit of the average citizen, including the old folks, those suffering from illness and the dread diseases and those who earn a living for themselves and their families by the sweat of their brow. He will be sorely missed.

Mrs. Rooney joins me in wishing BERT, his lovely wife Bernice, and their three fine children peace, happiness, and success in the many years to come.

REVIEW OF THE 93D CONGRESS—
REPORT TO THE PEOPLE OF OHIO

HON. ROBERT TAFT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, the record of the 93d Congress, while disappointing in certain respects, was on balance constructive.

For the first time in the history of the Nation the 25th amendment was invoked culminating in congressional approval of GERALD FORD to fill the vacancy of the office of Vice President. Subsequently with the succession of Mr. Ford to the Presidency, the 25th amendment was again invoked with the 93d Congress approving NELSON ROCKEFELLER to be the 41st Vice President of the United States.

The constitutional review and investigatory duties of the legislative branch were decisively exercised in responding to allegations of unethical and illegal activities connected with the 1972 Presidential election campaign. The Senate established a Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities, the Watergate Committee, to investigate these charges. Their findings ultimately led to the House Committee on the Ju-diary reporting articles of impeachment seeking the removal of Richard Nixon from the Presidency. The former President resigned, thus avoiding almost certain impeachment.

Undoubtedly, the debate surrounding impeachment and campaign activities divided the country and placed great strains on the process of government at all levels. The actions of the 93d Congress, however, in responding to its constitutional obligations in these areas illustrated the stability of our governmental process and hopefully will serve as a deterrent to any similar abuses of power by the Executive in the future.

In addition to responsibly fulfilling its constitutional oversight duties in the functioning of the executive branch, important legislative accomplishments of the 93d Congress included:

Passage of a pension reform-guarantee bill;

Enactment of trade reform measures greatly expanding international trade opportunities;

Increased veterans benefits;

Adoption of a permanent new job training and public employment program designed to be more responsive to local manpower needs;

Extensive reform of the Nation's agricultural policy with elimination of unproductive subsidy programs;

A comprehensive education bill;

Creation of a new agency to centralize and direct energy research and development;

Establishment of conservation standards for the strip mining of coal;

Enactment of the Budget Reform Act establishing a review and planning process for the Congress to regulate the expenditure of our Nation's tax resources;

A minimum wage bill broadly extending the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act;

Comprehensive campaign reform measures;

Creation of the Cuyahoga Valley National Recreation Area;

Improvement in the delivery of health care through improved medical training programs and creation of health maintenance organizations;

Mass transportation funding;

Extension of National Labor Relations Act protections to employees of our Nation's health care institutions;

Community development housing reform;

Increased social security benefits;

Adoption of a war powers resolution limiting the authority of the President to unilaterally deploy American Armed Forces; and

Creation of new programs to improve the delivery of legal aid to the economically disadvantaged including authorization to establish joint labor-management legal services trust funds.

Despite enactment of these, and other important measures, however, the 93d Congress failed to take action in a number of important areas—meaningful welfare reform, no-fault insurance, respiratory disease employment protection, tax reform, national health insurance, Federal agency restructuring, and, most important, economic policy.

The state of the economy is extremely discouraging and the country can ill afford to have a Congress that continues to react in a partisan nature in this crucial area. Despite limited action in expanding public service employment programs and extension of unemployment insurance coverage, the 93d Congress failed dismally to fashion any constructive economic program for the Nation, or respond authoritatively and expeditiously to programs submitted by the President. Undoubtedly tax reform, energy conservation, budgetary reductions, and other economic measures are politically sensitive, but neither this country, nor ultimately the economies of the free world can survive by a continual abdication of congressional responsibility and constructive involvement in this area.

Failure of the Congress, particularly the Senate, to initiate reforms of its own procedures and practices is also quite disturbing. Congress as an institution must be able to respond in a more thorough and expeditious manner to the increasingly complex problems of society. Not only must the most modern technology be implemented, but substantive procedural reforms must also be adopted. During the 93d Congress the Senate passed a total of 1,564 measures, approved 29 treaties, and confirmed 131,254 Executive appointments. In submitting my report to the people of Ohio, I believe the following areas to be of particular significance meriting further development:

I. THE ECONOMY

The 93d Congress was faced with the most difficult economic situation in decades. Policymakers were forced to grapple with stratospheric levels of inflation and a deepening recession at the same time.

Energy costs.—The fourfold increase in the fixed world price of crude oil in December 1973 quickly placed the stability of the world economic system in jeopardy. From America's standpoint, it became apparent that continued reliance on excessive levels of imported crude oil would be economically crippling and politically dangerous. It is apparent to me that strong mandatory energy conservation measures are necessary if the United States is to minimize its dependence on this energy source, but neither the 93d Congress nor the President were ready to move in this direction.

Congress did initiate limited programs to expand domestic energy production. However, it notoriously failed to enact legislation to tax the windfall profits of oil companies resulting from higher international oil prices. The 94th Congress should place a high priority on this issue and legislate a program whereby such revenues that are not used to increase domestic oil production are subjected to an excess profits tax.

Food.—Inflation also ravaged the food sector of the economy during the 93d Congress. There is little that the Government can do about some of the principal causes of this problem, such as poor world food crops in 1972, the Midwest drought in the summer of 1974 and the spurt upward in both domestic and foreign demand. The best long-run policy is to continue efforts to eliminate Government policies which restrict domestic production and imports. In that connection, the Agriculture Consumer Protection Act of 1973 was a major step forward.

The 93d Congress enacted legislation to provide for better monitoring of food exports. In view of the underestimated domestic effects of the Russian wheat deal in 1972, the need for this legislation is obvious. Another new law empowers a Commodity Futures Trading Commission to regulate commodities futures markets. Implementation of this legislation should help to prevent speculators from increasing food prices by manipulating aspects of this $500 billion market to the detriment of both farmers and consumers.

Federal budget.—There is no question that the excessive budget deficits of the late 1960's and early 1970's have helped to fuel inflation. In early 1973, the Senate passed my amendment to set a strict limit on governmental expenditures at a noninflationary level for fiscal 1974. The House of Representatives rejected that proposal.

However, Congress later passed the Budget Control and Impoundment Procedures Act of 1974 which I have described elsewhere. By assuring that each spending item be considered in relation to other spending demands and total revenues available, rather than piecemeal as is the present case, this law should foster sounder congressional budget decisions. However, this new measure will require thoughtful application by Congress since it will only work to the extent that individual Members consider budget matters intelligently and responsibly.

Wage-price controls.—The shortages, distortions, inequities, and redtape that resulted from wage and price controls in late 1973 and early 1974 underscored the great difficulties with policies designed to excessively plan and control the economy. Certainly there are merits for imposing certain control procedures, but I could not continue to support an inequitable and unworkable system, and accordingly voted against an extension of mandatory wage and price controls during the 93d Congress. However, I could see no justification for the Government's refusal to undertake even the relatively minor role of promoting voluntary price restraint in the private sector or to review its own policies to eliminate those which contributed to inflation. Further, I thought the commitments to price restraint which the Cost of Living Council had obtained during the price decontrol process should have been enforced. I introduced the Inflation Restraint Act of 1974 to accomplish those goals. A somewhat weakened version of that legislation later became law, in response to a request from President Ford for an agency to monitor the wage and price performance of management and labor.

A review of the Nation's economic statistics at the end of 1974, however, emphasizes the need for Congress to rethink the entire subject of controls. Perhaps as part of a comprehensive economic package, including selected tax cuts to curb the country's recessionary state, a mechanism of controls could be considered for certain key areas of the economy.

Material shortages.—For the first time since World War II, in 1973 and 1974, the American economy was plagued by shortages of both raw materials and manufactured products. Although the Congress passed legislation which created a commission to study the problem, I was convinced it should have gone further. The Congress should have designated an entity in the Government to monitor shortages, recommend preventive actions and help industries to cope with such shortages. One potential solution the 94th Congress should consider in this area is the implementation of investment tax credits and accelerated depreciation schedules to modernize and expand industrial capacity.

Productivity.—Increases in the productivity, or efficiency, of our workers and industries is another subject that should be given considerable attention by the next Congress. It is essential that constructive efforts be undertaken in this area to fight both inflation and foreign economic competition. Productivity increases allow our standard of living to be raised by permitting wage and salary increases which do not cause inflation. The Government should act as a catalyst to stimulate increased productivity in the private sector and review its own policies to determine changes which could result in productivity increases. Legislation I authored to create a National Commission on Productivity and Work Quality which can serve this function became law in 1974, although the Commission's funding level is presently insufficient.

Unemployment.—By the end of 1974, the U.S. unemployment was reaching disastrous levels. I have described elsewhere efforts to alleviate the problem through manpower training, public service employment, and housing legislation I have offered. I also urged the Federal Reserve Board throughout much of 1974 to ease its unduly harsh monetary policy, which was adversely affecting housing, small businesses, and other credit-related concerns.

The Economic Development Act was extended for 1 year during the 93d Congress to assist States in undertaking overall State economic development planning. This legislation also includes planning assistance for cities and sub-state planning and development organizations. A new title IX will assist States and communities experiencing or about to experience economic dislocations due to severe economic changes.

International trade.—The 93d Congress last major economic action was to pass the Trade Reform Act of 1974. The main purpose of this legislation is to authorize the President to negotiate reductions in worldwide trade barriers and establish more equitable treatment for American concerns in the international economic system.

I supported this legislation. I believe that the authority to negotiate such reforms will help expand export-related job opportunities for America. Three million Americans already have export-related jobs and in 1972, Ohio ranked first in the importance of export employment in manufacturing. The bill would also do a better job of protecting domestic American jobs than present law, by providing more extensive and effective relief to industries and workers troubled by increased imports and by providing better procedures for the Government to deal with unfair trade practices.

To the extent that the trade negotiations result in reduced U.S. import barriers such as import quotas or tariffs, the trade bill will also contribute to reduced United States inflation. In 1974, U.S. import barriers cost American consumers about $10 billion per year. In that regard, the Senate accepted my amendment to require a report on the effects of each such import barrier on American jobs and prices, so that workers, consumers and Government officials will know who is benefiting from import relief at the expense of higher prices to our consumers and what the relief is doing for American jobs.

The trade bill also contained the Jackson amendment, which is expected to result in the emigration of about 60,000 Soviet Jews and other oppressed Soviet citizens in 1975. I do, however, have certain apprehensions regarding recent Soviet statements on this issue. These concerns are expressed in section XVIII of this report.

In addition, enactment of the trade legislation averted a difficult situation in which the United States would be pressing for crucial and difficult international cooperation on matters such as energy conservation and development, while its hands would be tied in the tremendously important area of international trade negotiations.

II. ENERGY CONSERVATION AND DEVELOPMENT

The concern of the 93d Congress with the energy crisis and the need for increased conservation and development of our natural resources led to the enactment of a number of measures. At the very start of the 93d Congress, amendments to the Economic and Stabilization Act of 1970 were introduced to promote competition in the petroleum industry and to assure equitable energy distribution. This legislation became public law in April 1973.

With increasing awareness of the magnitude of energy-related programs, Congress enacted legislation authorizing construction of the Alaskan pipeline to tap the tremendous oil resources in the North Slope region. The Federal Energy Administration was established to coordinate our efforts in conserving energy and utilizing new resources. A new energy research agency was created, the Energy Research and Development Administration, to oversee our Nation's exploration and development of alternative sources of energy, such as, geothermal, solar, coal liquefaction, coal gasification, advanced power cycles, and nuclear energy. I supported and worked for the passage of all these measures.

Natural gas.—Deregulation of the price of new natural gas at the wellhead was considered. Past regulation of natural gas prices has stifled production and exploration necessary to meet the ever-increasing demand for this resource.

December 20, 1974

The immediate problem in this area is how to permit adequate prices to encourage exploration, but still maintain a structure that does not permit windfall profits for the industry.

Surface mining.—Surface mining legislation passed the 93d Congress but unfortunately was not signed into law by the President. Coal is our most abundant source of energy, but we must learn to adapt it to many uses and in a way that will not damage the land and the air. Surface mining is both the most economical and the most environmentally destructive method of extracting coal. The damage caused by strip mining, however, can be repaired and this legislation would have provided a reasonable reclamation program for such mining. Undoubtedly, legislation in this area will be a priority item of the next Congress.

Vehicle regulation.—The Federal Aid Highway Act amendments were enacted by the Congress to respond to issues raised by the energy crisis. Among the provisions of this legislation was a section making the 55-m.p.h. speed limit permanent. Another part of this bill permits modest increases in the allowable weights of trucks on interstate highways. While I did not support the truck weight increase because of safety factors and the added wear that would be caused to highways, I supported final passage of this legislation with its provisions for highway beautification and for outlawing the seatbelt interlock systems in automobiles.

In 1974, the Congress enacted legislation to amend the Clean Air Act to provide for temporary suspension of certain air pollution requirements, by extending 1975 model year auto emission standards through the 1976 model year. This bill, which was signed into law, also provides for some power plants which now use electricity to convert to coal in recognition of the need to continue our energy conservation efforts. I supported this measure since I believe it represents a constructive balance between environmental goals and the long-term energy needs of the country.

The Nation has experienced hardships and inconveniences of energy shortages; high gas prices, increased heating oil prices, shorter store hours, cooler buildings, and winter daylight saving time. Through voluntary cooperation, Americans have contributed to reducing the impact of the energy crisis. More must be accomplished however, both from volunteerism and from governmental initiatives. Hopefully the 94th Congress will make a significant contribution in this area and provide leadership in achieving greater energy independence for the United States.

III. CONGRESSIONAL REFORM

In the aftermath of Watergate, the 93d Congress passed sweeping campaign reform legislation. The major purpose of this legislation was to eliminate big money from politics.

Campaign financing.—Basic reforms in campaign financing were essential. Citizens must have the legal basis for believing that their Government is not being operated to satisfy the interests of a few large contributors, rather than the Nation as a whole. Strict limitations were needed on the amounts which individuals or organizations could contribute to any single candidate.

Although the Senate bill contained such limits, it also provided full public funding for political candidates' general election campaigns. I felt that this would allow more public funding than necessary, foster a mushrooming of wasteful campaign expenditures at taxpayers' expense and unnecessarily eliminate a meaningful role for small private contributions and related grassroots fundraising efforts. Several other Senators and I offered a substitute proposal which would have provided partial rather than complete public financing. Our proposal was defeated by a key Senate vote of 46 to 45.

To emphasize to the House of Representatives that these problems and others were contained in the Senate bill, I voted against it.

I did vote for the final version of the legislation, which did not contain full public funding for congressional elections. Its most important advances included limitations on the amount of contributions which any individual or organization could contribute to any single candidate, and a much stronger enforcement mechanism for Federal campaign laws. However, I still have some qualms about provisions in the new law including: sections which permit special interest organizations to contribute five times as much to any candidate as individuals; authorizations for organizations to contribute up to $10,000 per candidate for primary and general elections combined; and set ceilings on overall campaign spending which may be so low that they increase well-known incumbents' advantage over unknown challengers, particularly in House races.

There is uncertainty as to whether this new law will be upheld by the courts, however, since a number of constitutional challenges have surfaced and it may be that the 94th Congress will again be presented with substantial questions in the campaign reform area.

Congressional spending.—In another comprehensive reform, the 93d Congress passed the Budget Control and Impoundment Procedures Act of 1974. This historic legislation completely reorganizes Congress procedures for considering the budget. At present, each proposed spending item is analyzed piecemeal, rather than in relation to other spending needs and the Government funds available. The new law, which I strongly supported, contains some of my specific suggestions. It would require Congress to consider overall spending demands and revenues available and then review various categories of programs in relation to each other, as well as spending levels for each program. Federal revenues lost and gained through various aspects of the tax system would also come under increased and much-needed scrutiny.

Although this legislation could help to bring about intelligent budget decisions, its success depends on the "budget-consciousness" of each Congressman and Senator.

Along those lines, late in the 93d Congress I introduced the Inflation Impact Statement Act of 1974. This legislation would require all bills reported from congressional committees to contain, to the extent possible, an estimate of their impact on the price of goods and services over the coming 5 years. I feel strongly about the need for such legislation because too often, Congress neither looks at the Federal budget cost nor examines the impact of its enactments. It has been estimated, for example, that paperwork required by the Federal Government costs the private sector approximately $50 billion per year, yet this cost is not reflected anywhere in the Federal budget, and thus is not considered carefully enough by Congress.

I am hopeful that the 94th Congress will adopt my inflation impact proposal since this procedure would greatly improve the Federal budgetary process.

Open government.—In furtherance of open government, the Senate of the 93d Congress decided to open to the public committee sessions at which legislation is actually being decided upon. I strongly supported this change and I participated in a successful effort to open appropriate sessions of the Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee for the first time.

As a ranking Senate member of the Joint Committee on Congressional Operations, I have been involved in a number of congressional reform areas including: change in the seniority system, establishment of a hearing examiner process to improve the information gathering process of the Congress, refinement and definition of the doctrine of legislative immunity, and improvement of the information resources available to the Congress through the use of computer data banks.

Consistent with the objective of opening up the process of government, I have also been extensively involved in the joint committee's efforts to provide broadcast coverage of Senate Chamber proceedings. I coauthored a proposal that would permit continuous radio and television coverage of Senate proceedings on an experimental basis. This proposal has been endorsed by majority and minority leaders in the Congress and chances are excellent that it will be adopted by the 94th Congress.

As I have mentioned in the following section, I also introduced legislation which would require Congress to vote directly on any salary increases it proposes for itself, rather than receiving these increases through backdoor legislation as is presently the case. Unfortunately, the 93d Congress did not enact this proposal.

IV. CONGRESSIONAL PAY RAISE

An area of concern and discontent among many constituents has been the proposed congressional pay raise. I opposed the President's recommendation for a congressional pay raise in March 1974.

Current procedure requires that congressional salaries be considered along with those of career Government employees in the GS-16, -17, and -18 pay levels, and Federal judges, sub-Cabinet officials, and other top Government jobs. These employees have not had a salary increase—not even a cost-of-living raise—in over 5 years. This has caused many problems including the inability to attract and retain qualified people in public service.

December 20, 1974

When the President's recommendation for a pay raise for Federal employees in top pay grades was considered in the Senate, it became apparent that the relationship between congressional salaries and those of career civil servants jeopardized the recommendation for all Government employee pay raises. I have long felt that congressional salaries should be debated separately from other legislation and I have introduced legislation to remove the congressional salaries from the authority of the Wage Commission, which recommends salary increases. Congressional salaries would then be increased only by separate legislation, to be debated openly on the floor. Consideration of pay increases for the Congress would have to be decided in the open, permitting complete public scrutiny. I am convinced that only by proceeding in such a manner, on this and other subjects, can confidence of the Nation be restored in the process of Government.

V. CONSUMER AFFAIRS

There were a number of significant advancements for consumers during the 93d Congress.

Consumer Product Safety Commission.—Early in the first session, the Consumer Product Safety Commission was formally established. This new Federal agency was enacted into law with my support during the 92d Congress and already has made an important impact in establishing safety standards in areas ranging from combustible material to toys.

Consumer Food Act.—The Senate passed the Consumer Food Act to provide greater insurance that food is safe and wholesome. This measure, which passed the Senate in July of 1974, amends the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act to require the development of a comprehensive Food and Drug Administration (FDA) safety plan, including a mandate for at least annual inspections of food processing establishments. This measure also confirms FDA authority to: order that food be date labeled; require nutritional information for certain foods in a specified format; and require certain ingredients to be quantitatively listed by percentage of the ingredient in the food. Unfortunately, the House took no action on this measure.

Motor vehicle safety.—Amendments to the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act did become law, however, during the 93d Congress. These enactments empower the Secretary of Transportation to require manufacturers of motor vehicles, motor vehicle equipment, and tires which contain safety-related defects or which fail to comply with motor vehicle safety standards, to remedy such defects without charge to the consumer. This new measure also requires the Secretary of Transportation to set mandatory safety standards for schoolbuses and contains provisions requiring motor vehicles to have safer types of fuel tanks. Enforcement authority is included with maximum fines up to $400,000 for violations of this law.

Warranties.—Legislation was passed by this Congress setting disclosure and designation standards for written warranties on products that cost the consumer more than $10. This measure also codifies the authority of the Federal Trade Commission to make substantive rules for unfair or deceptive practices in or affecting commerce. This bill was signed into law at the conclusion of the 93d Congress.

Pyramid sales.—The Pyramid Sales Act was passed by the Senate in August of 1974 making a known sale, offer or attempt to sell, or to participate in a pyramid sales scheme a criminal offense.

Antitrust enforcement.—Antitrust procedures and penalties were reviewed, with increases in the fines for violations of the Sherman Act from $50,000 to $100,000 for individuals and to $1 million for corporations. This measure, which is now public law, also requires that any proposal for a consent decree judgment be published in the Federal Register 60 days prior to the proposed date of judgment and be accompanied by a competitive impact statement prepared by the Department of Justice. Further, provisions also require that comments by interested parties shall be published with the district court to consider such statements in determining whether the proposed judgment is in the public interest. Defendants are required by the new law to disclose all communications made in their behalf other than those of counsel of record to officials of the Justice Department.

Congress was also active in exercising its oversight-investigative authority regarding antitrust questions. Oil companies, sugar producers, and other food processors were questioned regarding competitive practices and a number of resolutions were enacted to specifically authorize further investigation by executive branch agencies. As an example, in August, the Senate passed a resolution requesting the FTC to investigate the margins that exist between farm and retail prices of livestock, dairy products, poultry, and eggs. I supported this, and other similar resolutions, and believe the 94th Congress must continue to actively review business structures and procedures to insure that competitive practices and antitrust laws are followed.

No-fault insurance.—Failure to pass a no-fault insurance bill during the 93d Congress has to be one of the more disappointing developments in the consumer area. Although the Senate did pass legislation with my support that would set Federal minimum standards for States, the House refused to take any action in this area.

Statistics indicate that a great percent of automobile insurance premium dollars never go to pay people who are hurt and suffer economic loss. Many courts are congested with automobile accident cases and frequently judicial processes are used as a bargaining weapon by parties. I believe it is time for a change of such a system.

Agency for Consumer Advocacy.—Substantial disagreement continued in the 93d Congress regarding the creation of a new Government agency to intervene in actions affecting consumer interests by executive branch agencies. Legislation was considered to establish an Agency for Consumer Advocacy (ACA). While the objective of this proposal was to protect the interests of consumers, and one which I fully support, I questioned the advisability of creating another layer of Federal bureaucracy to duplicate the functions and duties of existing agencies. As reviewed in section XXII of this report, extensive reform and restructuring of executive branch agencies is long overdue. Many agencies have become captives of the industries they are to regulate. I have long advocated that the noncompetitive practices and wasteful policies that result from some agency decisions, such as certain ICC rulings, must be eliminated.

Congress has the responsibility to see that Federal agencies do operate efficiently and fairly, and the changes that are needed should be accomplished through regulatory reform. I authored a legislative proposal as a substitute amendment to the Agency for Consumer Advocacy which would have accomplished this objective. I do not believe it is wise for Congress to try to sidestep this responsibility by passing the buck to a new superagency duplicating existing agency duties, especially at a time when Government spending should be curtailed. There is no guarantee that such a new agency will not fall into the same type of control by special interest groups that now occurs with existing agencies.

There are also great difficulties in determining precisely which "consumer interest" is to be represented as quite often there are numerous competing interests. The proposal before the Senate during this Congress provided no guidance on this question.

The 94th Congress must take effective action to better protect the rights of consumers before Government regulatory agencies. Abdication of legislative branch oversight in this area to another layer of executive bureaucracy such as the ACA is not the answer. Congress must assume this responsibility.

VI. HEALTH

National health insurance.—Although national health insurance became a major issue in the 93d Congress, no action was taken. I cosponsored legislation which would free American families from the worry of serious debt or bankruptcy resulting from an extended or catastrophic illness in the family, by providing a national catastrophic insurance program. I am convinced that this is necessary because the average American family simply cannot afford the cost of care for an extended or catastrophic illness of one of its members.

The 94th Congress may move beyond catastrophic coverage in the direction of national health insurance, and it is certainly true that other reforms in the Federal medical insurance programs are needed. The possible Federal budget costs and effects on inflation in the health care industry will be major considerations as Congress debates what the scope of Federal involvement in health care financing and delivery should be.

Other health issues did receive considerable attention of the Congress, and as a member of the Senate Health Subcommittee, I had an opportunity to participate quite extensively in this area.

Emergency medical services.—One of the more important proposals enacted was the establishment of important emergency medical services programs. I was pleased to cosponsor this legislation which will provide Federal aid to area-wide systems of emergency medical care. Under this new program, grants and contracts are to be provided to plan, establish, initially operate, and expand area emergency care systems and to train personnel to conduct research in emergency medicine. Through this legislation it is estimated that as many as 35,000 Americans can be saved from tragic, unnecessary deaths caused by heart attacks and auto deaths.

Health services.—Another important health measure passed by the 93d Congress was the Health Revenue Sharing and Health Services Act of 1974. This legislation extends and revises several important health services programs including: Authority for family planning and population research programs which I cosponsored; financial assistance to community mental health centers—to provide a full range of preventive and therapeutic mental health services to patients, thus increasing the accessibility, quantity, and range of mental health services available at the community level; development of migrant health centers; and specific authority for community health centers—commonly known as neighborhood health centers.

New programs in this legislation also include a National Center for the Prevention and Control of Rape; home health services and the appointment of a Committee on Mental Health and Illness of the Elderly, referred to under legislation for the aging; and finally, authority for Federal assistance to aid in the establishment of comprehensive hemophilia diagnostic and treatment centers; commission for control of epilepsy; and a commission for control of Huntington's disease—all of which I cosponsored.

Health manpower.—Health manpower legislation enacted by the Senate would have improved the professional training and availability of physicians. Under the bill which I coauthored, medical schools would reserve 25 percent of their first year class for individuals who voluntarily agreed to practice in medically underserved areas. These students would be entitled to a Federal scholarship in return for primary care service in such shortage areas. If an individual refused to carry out his commitment, he would be required to pay back twice the cost of his assistance plus interest.

As for the licensing of doctors and dentists, the proposal continued to rely on present methods of examination, such as the so-called federation's licensing exam. Foreign medical graduates, as a condition of admission to the United States, would be required to take the same examinations as U.S. medical graduates. In addition, the foreign medical graduate would have to be proficient in oral and written English. Unfortunately, no action was taken by the House on this proposal.

Health maintenance.—Improvement in the delivery of health care to the country was also achieved with the enactment of legislation to establish health maintenance organizations—H.M.O.'s. Under this new public law, funding is provided for establishment of centers specializing in group preventive medicine and comprehensive health care. Although further experimentation is necessary to achieve maximum results from such programs, I believe the potential of H.M.O.'s to provide Americans with better medical care is considerable.

Physical and mental handicapped legislation.—Legislation was considered by the 93d Congress to improve our Nation's programs to help physically and mentally handicapped individuals to work, earn, and live independently in their communities. The Vocational Rehabilitation Act was amended to extend and improve vocational and other rehabilitation services for the handicapped. The Developmentally Disabled Assistance Bill of Rights Act received my enthusiastic endorsement to assist the approximately 9 million persons in the United States who are developmentally disabled, become productive members of society.

Lead-based paint.—I was pleased to cosponsor and support the Lead-Based Paint Poisoning Prevention Act amendments which provide for the continuation of a very important program enacted in 1970, for the detection and elimination of a serious manmade childhood disease, lead paint poisoning.

While lead-based paint poisoning is preventable, there are many things about the present situation that we do not know. Acceptable levels of lead content in paint must be determined and procedures for removing concentrations of lead contaminants found. A direct and fully coordinated Federal effort is clearly essential and I believe the Lead-Based Paint Poisoning Prevention Act is a step in that direction.

Sudden infant death.—Among the mysteries of American health care, few are persistently as complex as the disease known as sudden infant death syndrome—SIDS. The mortality rate from SIDS is about 3 per 1,000 live births. In this country, it is estimated that some 7,000 to 10,000 infants die each year as a result of this syndrome. No one yet knows what causes this tragic killer. I supported the Sudden Infant Death Syndrome Act of 1974 because I believe it is essential to expand the research program into the causes of this disease. The bill calls upon the National Institute of Child Health and Human Development to carry out this research program. In addition, it authorizes a program for the development of public information and professional education materials relating to SIDS.

Cancer research.—I have been deeply committed to the expanding cancer research program which was augmented in December 1971, with my support. This program made possible intensified cancer research efforts and brought major achievements in the Nation's efforts against this dread disease. In the 93d Congress I supported and cosponsored the National Cancer Act of 1974, which extends for another 3 years those programs being conducted by the National Cancer Institute and the National Institutes of Health, and also provides necessary tools for this program's continued progress.

I supported and cosponsored legislation to expand the authority of the National Institute of Arthritis, Metabolic and Digestive Diseases in order to advance a national attack on arthritis. This legislation is very important since such efforts may indeed soon determine the cause or causes of this crippling disease from which so many of our citizens suffer.

VII. PENSION PROTECTION

After spending over 3 years working for enactment of a pension reform bill, I am pleased to report that the Congress approved by a large margin the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of which I was a coauthor and cosponsor. On Labor Day of 1974, President Ford signed this historic measure into law.

After listening to extensive testimony, including extremely enlightening information obtained from field hearings in Cleveland, I became convinced that basic protections were necessary to insure that American workers were not left with financial insecurity in their senior years. The statistics were startling. For example, studies revealed that 1 of every 10 workers covered by pension plans in several low-wage industries would never receive the pension benefits which they had been counting on all their lives.

While this new public law is not perfect or complete, it is one of the most significant enactments in the labor field in years. I am proud to have taken a major role in its creation and passage. Provisions of the act include:

Minimum vesting formulas whereby participants in pension plans would be covered under one of three optional plans:

First. Twenty-five percent vesting within 5 years and 5-percent vesting for the next 5 years. The following 5 years vesting increases at the rate of 10 percent per year with 100-percent vesting achieved at 15 years;

Second. Full vesting within 10 years;

Third. "Rule of 45" plan providing that an employee is 50 percent vested when his age plus years of service equal 45 or more. Thereafter vesting is increased by 10 percent per year;

Termination insurance program to insure payment of pension benefits to participants in pension plans that are cancelled;

Minimum funding requirements; and Strong fiduciary standards establishing statutory investment guidelines and operating procedures for trustees of pension plans.

VIII. LABOR AND MANPOWER TRAINING

The record of the 93d Congress in the labor and manpower training area was quite positive. In addition to passage of the landmark pension reform bill referred to in the previous section, the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee was active in reporting a number of important legislative proposals.

December 20, 1974

Prepaid legal services.—During the 1st session of the 93d Congress, the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, of which I am a member, recommended passage of a bill to amend the Labor-Management Relations Act to add prepaid legal services as an eligible fringe benefit that joint labor-management trust funds could administer. The need for this legislation was underscored by the increasing costs of obtaining legal advice and representation by our Nation's wage earners. As mentioned in section XVI of this report pertaining to the new Legal Services Corporation, often the primary factor determining the quantity and quality of legal representation an individual receives in our society has not been the person's need, but rather his or her ability to pay.

This simply is not an acceptable way to provide legal assistance in a country that is committed to the principle of equal justice under the law. In authorizing provisions of this bill, which is now public law, my objective was to provide a procedure whereby necessary legal advice could be as accessible for employees as is medical care under joint labor-management health benefit plans. Results of this new law, including programs in Ohio, would seem to indicate such an objective is attainable.

NLRA coverage of health care employees.—Another important labor measure that I authored also became law during the 93d Congress. This measure, reported out of the Senate Labor Committee, extends the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA) to our Nation's nonprofit health care institutions and their employees. It implements the procedures and protections of the NLRA to resolve jurisdictional and recognition disputes that have been particularly prevalent in the health care field. Protections are also included in this new public law to minimize the disruption of health care delivery through precontract expiration bargaining procedures and mandatory involvement of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service when impasse situations develop. With this important balance of concerns for patient care and collective bargaining, I am quite hopeful that greater labor relations stability will result thereby reducing the bitter and wasteful labor-management confrontations which have plagued the health care industry.

Minimum wage.—For the first time since 1966, Congress enacted increases in the Federal minimum wage and greatly extended coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA). This new public law increases the old minimum wage level for nonagricultural employees from $1.60 to $2.30 an hour. Agricultural workers' minimum wage level is raised from the old rate of $1.30 also to $2.30 an hour through a series of step increases. Such an increase for agricultural workers under FLSA marks the first time that parity has been achieved with other covered employees. The enacted amendments extend the minimum wage and overtime provisions of the FLSA to Federal, State, county, and local public employees, domestics, babysitters, and certain previously exempt agricultural employees.

While I supported the final conference version of the bill, I objected to a number of provisions contained in the Senate measure. I felt the proposed increases were too rapid and would result in the curtailment of job opportunities, especially in nonmetropolitan regions of the country. Statistics also indicated that such quick increases reduce youth employment, especially for black and minority youth. Further constitutional questions existed regarding the extended scope of coverage of the legislation. It is questionable if domestics and babysitters come under the Interstate Commerce clause jurisdiction of the FLSA. Constitutional questions also are involved regarding Federal regulation and coverage of State, county, and local governmental public employees. As I write this report, the U.S. Supreme Court has issued a temporary injunction against implementation of part of the public employee section of the new law, pending a final constitutional review of such coverage.

I would have preferred a minimum wage bill that did not extend the scope of coverage of the FLSA so drastically and a proposal that would have achieved a slightly higher wage rate over a graduated time frame, thus lessening inflationary and disemployment effects. My efforts to achieve this objective, unfortunately, were rejected by the Congress.

Farm labor.—Reforms of farm labor recruitment and supervision policies were enacted by this Congress. The new Farm Labor Contract Act increases reporting and certification requirements for farm labor contractors, requires minimum safety standards for vehicles used to transport workers, and creates a Federal civil remedy for individuals aggrieved by violations of the act, among other provisions.

Railroad retirement.—Restructuring of the railroad retirement system was another important contribution of the Labor Committee during the 93d Congress. The railroad retirement fund was in serious jeopardy of going into bankruptcy since more rail workers were retiring than coming into this industry. Although I believe railroads have an extremely important role to play in our country's future as I mentioned in another part of this report, some immediate action was necessary. After receiving recommendations from rail management and labor, the Labor Committee drafted a proposal that streamlined the fund's operation and prevented payment of future windfall dual benefits from both the social security fund and the railroad retirement fund. This approach, which is now public law, will insure that our Nation's retired railroad workers, including approximately 100,000 employees in Ohio, will receive their much deserved benefits.

Manpower training.—Manpower training and related job benefit programs were major issues of concentration in the 93d Congress.

At the conclusion of the first session of this Congress, a completely new Federal job training and public service employment program was adopted. This measure, the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973 (CETA) was a result of extensive research and study, including very productive field hearings I chaired in Dayton and Akron.

The act, which has been signed into law, institutes a number of affirmative changes from old programs and is designed to make training and employment opportunities more responsive to the needs of local and regional job markets.

Emergency employment provisions were included to permit funding for transitional public service jobs in regions experiencing 6.5 percent unemployment or more for 3 consecutive months.

These provisions, while adequate at the time of passage in 1973, were not flexible enough to respond to unemployment problems in certain parts of the country, nor did this procedure permit automatic funding for additional public service jobs to coincide with potential increases in unemployment. To correct these deficiencies, I offered a substitute proposal that would have lowered the unemployment trigger to 6 percent and included a flexible funding procedure that would have increased funding authorization for each increment of one-half percent that the average rate of national unemployment exceeded 6 percent for 3 consecutive months.

While the Senate rejected my substitute, Congress did enact an emergency public service job program at the end of the 93d Congress in light of rising unemployment. This measure which is now law, authorizes funding for 333,000 new public service jobs of 1-year duration to supplement the 170,000 positions that were already available under CETA. Another part of this measure creates temporary unemployment insurance for employees not now covered by jobless benefits, including State and local government employees, farmworkers, and domestic workers.

The final important manpower related bill enacted by the 93d Congress was the Emergency Unemployment Compensation Act. This legislation, which I cosponsored, provides an additional 13 weeks of assistance to individuals who are now covered by unemployment insurance. President Ford signed this measure into law after the conclusion of the 93d Congress.

While the above record of this Congress in the labor area can, in many respects, be labeled impressive, there are a great number of challenges ahead. I was particularly disappointed that more attention was not given to respiratory diseases. It is becoming more obvious with each new set of scientific and medical findings that there are great health problems connected with certain industrial employment positions in this country. As many as 100,000 Americans, it has been estimated, may die each year from conditions they are exposed to in their jobs. The 92d Congress made some progress in this area by passing the Black Lung Benefits Act to help our Nation's coal miners. Workers in other industries must also be assisted, however, to combat such diseases as asbestosis, silicosis, and berylliosis. I introduced legislation during the 93d Congress to deal with this problem, the Respiratory Disease Benefits Act, S. 1029. Unfortunately no action was taken on my proposal.

Other labor areas on the agenda for the 94th Congress include: bargaining impasse settlement procedures, especially for agricultural and public employees; review of the Occupational Health and Safety Act of 1970; productivity and work-environment problems, and funding and operating procedures for the National Institute of Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH), the Federal agency charged with responsibility of recommending standards to OSHA to improve our Nation's working men and women's job environment in health and safety areas.

IX. HOUSING AND COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

After more than 3 years of debate, the 93d Congress passed the Housing and Community Development Act of 1974.

I believe that the community development provisions of this legislation will prove to be a milestone in our efforts to attack difficult urban problems such as deteriorating housing and slum conditions. This legislation replaces 10 narrowly defined but sometimes overlapping Federal programs, including urban renewal and model cities, with one block grant program. The result will be more program flexibility at the local level, less red tape and less bureaucratic second-guessing of local needs.

Of the provisions of the legislation which I authored, the most important would direct communities to give the maximum feasible priority under the program to activities which will aid persons with low- and moderate-incomes to prevent or eliminate slums and urban blight. This provision is necessary so that the program will not become a virtual duplicate of general revenue sharing, which dictates no Federal priorities between expenditures for slum clearance, municipal golf courses, preservation of existing housing, monuments to local heroes, and all the other diverse types of expenditures. I support general revenue sharing, but the new program should specifically address difficult community development problems rather than duplicate it.

Because over 10 million Americans are still illhoused, the Housing and Community Development Act of 1974 continued the federally subsidized housing program in somewhat revised form. I support that continuation, although I believe that many further improvements can be made in these programs.

I offered several amendments included in the new law which would direct further efforts toward the preservation of neighborhoods and the existing housing stock. This approach recognizes that the new construction approach of past low-income housing programs is troubled by tremendous costs to the taxpayer, frequent neighborhood opposition, environmental concerns, the increasing scarcity of land, and the fact that the middle- or moderate-income citizens are not helped by such programs to find housing. Furthermore, Federal efforts to preserve existing housing and neighborhoods in their early stages of decline can stave off the need for an expensive and disruptive comprehensive urban renewal-type approach. Some of my amendments changed our national housing goal to: Reflect the importance of housing preservation, continue the Federal housing rehabilitation loan program, guarantee extensions of FHA mortgages so that landlords and homeowners can obtain additional money for rehabilitation without assuming greater monthly housing expenses, expand FHA loan guarantee programs for the repair of small apartments and improve Federal cost control procedures in the new urban homesteading program of donating abandoned housing units to those who will repair them and live in them for a specified time.

The new housing law places special emphasis on housing for the elderly and handicapped. It includes my amendment to expand the use of rent supplements in elderly and handicapped housing projects, so that more of the poorest of those citizens can be served in a project.

I am proud that the new law also contains legislation I cosponsored which requires the Federal Government to institute and enforce mobile home safety standards. The need for this action is clearly illustrated by a study indicating that because so many mobile homes have had serious defects, insurance premiums are 70 percent higher for a $7,000 mobile home than for a $25,000 house.

Near the end of the 93d Congress, the Emergency Home Purchase Assistance Act was passed to provide a much-needed boost in housing construction. I cosponsored this legislation because the additional mortgage credit to be provided was expected to boost housing starts by at least 100,000, thus alleviating the housing squeeze somewhat and providing more work for the construction industry. However, I felt that the legislation should have covered apartments and condominiums rather than just expensive, land-consuming and energy-consuming single family housing. I introduced legislation to achieve that objective and will continue to pursue this modification in the 94th Congress.

Most Americans' housing will continue to be supplied without Federal subsidies or programs. Unfortunately, Congress did not support my effort to trim housing costs by providing for elimination of unnecessary building codes and unproductive work rules. Congress also failed to pass my bill to provide a $500 tax exemption for interest on savings accounts, which would vastly increase the funds that savings associations would have available to make mortgage loans. Hopefully, action will be forthcoming on both of these issues in the next Congress.

X. ENVIRONMENT

A number of very important environmental measures passed the Senate during the 93d Congress. Unfortunately, two of the most significant Senate enactments, however, did not become public law—the Land-Use Policy and Planning Act, S. 268, and the Surface Mining Reclamation Act, S. 425, also referred to elsewhere in this report.

Land use.—The House failed to act on land use policy legislation after the Senate had given strong support to a land-use measure. The Senate bill which I supported and cosponsored, would establish an Office of Land-Use Policy Administration in the Department of Interior to administer a grant program designated to encourage and assist States in developing land-use programs. The proposal would have been particularly helpful in planning for projects such as powerplants and airports that have severe environmental impact. The act would also have helped to coordinate all Federal and State land-use programs. Hopefully, legislation in this area will be a priority item of the 94th Congress.

Strip mining.—Due to a Presidential pocket veto, surface mining legislation also unfortunately failed to become law during the 93d Congress. Strong support exists for legislation in this area, both in the Senate and House, and this undoubtedly is another area that will receive the attention of the new Congress.

The Surface Mining Reclamation Act, which passed the Senate with my support, would have established a nationwide program to protect against adverse effects to the environment from strip mining. It would have provided authority for the Secretary of Interior to administer State grant-in-aid programs to: First, develop State regulatory programs for surface mining and reclamation; second, purchase and reclaim abandoned and unreclaimed mined lands; third, develop State land-use planning processes with provisions for designating certain areas unsuitable for mining; and, fourth, administer general research and demonstration programs. The measure would also have established an office in the Interior Department to administer and enforce the act.

A number of environmental measures did become law, however, during the 93d Congress. Legislation was enacted into law to protect endangered species—Public Law 93-205. The Water Resources Development Act of 1974, designed to check streambank and shoreline erosion and providing provisions for improved flood control, became law—Public Law 93-251. The National Forest and Rangeland Environmental Management Act, improving national forest system management, was adopted—Public Law 93-378. Solid waste disposal project funding was continued. The Clean Air Act of 1970 was extended—Public Law 93-15. An international convention for preventing the pollution of the seas by oil was implemented by the Oil Pollution Act Amendments of 1973—Public Law 93-119. A safe drinking water program was enacted within the Environmental Protection Agency to regulate drinking water and to set standards to protect public water supplies from contamination—Public Law 93-523. Finally, after the adjournment of the Congress, President Ford signed into law legislation to regulate the development of offshore deep-water ports for the use of tankers transporting oil and natural gas.

XI. SENIOR CITIZENS

This Nation has a high stake in providing a better life for its senior citizens. There is no group more deserving of assistance or more willing to help themselves than our senior citizens.

December 20, 1974

Older Americans Act.—I cosponsored and strongly supported the Older Americans Comprehensive Services Amendments of 1973. This landmark legislation provides effective means for delivering vitally needed social services to the aged so that they may live independently in their homes, rather than being prematurely and unnecessarily institutionalized.

I also cosponsored legislation to extend for 3 years title VII of the Older Americans Act relating to the nutrition program for the elderly. Hunger and malnutrition in America generally result from an inadequate income or limited knowledge of nutrition. The elderly have a high level of malnutrition relative to other age groups because older persons face problems of physical immobility making it difficult to shop for or prepare food. This legislation should correct a number of these problems.

Social security.—In late 1973, the Senate passed a major bill dealing with social security, medicare and medicaid, but no major legislation of this type became law. That bill contained some extremely important provisions, such as a liberalization of the earnings limitation which now penalizes elderly Americans trying to earn a living, coverage under medicare of prescription drugs, reforms in the social security tax structure which would have taken some of the disproportionate burden off the shoulders of the working poor, and my amendment to extend medicare coverage to certain disabled citizens who should have had it years ago. I am hopeful that the 94th Congress will address both these problems and the financing of the social security system, which has become an important issue in view of the ever-expanding social security tax burden.

Supplemental security income (SSI).—Congress did take a major step forward in 1972 when it standardized the welfare program for the aged, blind, and disabled segment of our population. Unfortunately, many problems have developed in this new supplemental security income program—SSI. I introduced legislation to deal with many of these problems by eliminating a bizarre rule which forces some recipients who live in institutions which cost more than the maximum benefit level either to forfeit SSI entirely or to leave the institution. My proposal would also eliminate the disincentives for private persons and charities to help support SSI recipients and thus take some of the burden of support off the Government. This bill additionally would: provide fairer and more easily administrable rules for determining the food stamp eligibility of SSI recipients, improve in several ways the legal rights of recipients, and provide for more rational treatment of thousands of individuals who have been dropped from the rolls solely because they reside in public, nonmedical institutions. The latter provision is of extreme importance to Ohio, because the prohibition of present law against SSI payments to inmates of public nonmedical institutions eliminated thousands of Ohioans from the program unnecessarily.

Most of these problems were not resolved by the 93d Congress. However, Congress did pass my bill to clear up legal problems that had prevented SSI recipients from receiving assistance during the weeks or months these recipients were waiting for determinations of SSI eligibility.

Aging research.—There are still many unanswered questions about growing old. Therefore, I was pleased to support legislation to improve the quality of our progress of aging research. Through enactment of a bill to establish a National Institute on Aging, biomedical, social, and behavioral research can be conducted relating to the aging process as well as the diseases and other special problems and needs of the elderly. The major problem of the aged is the maintenance of functional capabilities, both mental and physical to the maximum extent so as to make life worth living for as long as possible. An important function of the new Institute will be to actively expand current and future research to the accomplishment of this goal.

XII. EDUCATION

The educational problems in America will never be resolved until the quality of education for all children, regardless of their social or economic status, attains a level commensurate with the demands of life in our complex society and offers the opportunity for the fulfillment of the potential individual abilities. In a step to achieve such a goal, I supported the educational amendments of 1974 which expanded and extended Federal programs in elementary and secondary education.

The provisions of the new public law combine Federal assistance for elementary and secondary education into a smaller, more manageable number of grant categories, and thus provide larger financial grants for education problems of the highest priority.

An answer to the problem of structural unemployment begins with an increased national dedication to strong basic education, so that every child will have the requisite skills in comprehension, communication, and simple mathematics to qualify for more advanced training. I cosponsored an amendment to authorize Federal assistance for a program called Project SEED—special elementary education for the disadvantaged. Under this program, professional mathematicians and scientists are brought into the classroom to teach mathematics to disadvantaged children. Programs such as these will not only raise the achievement level of such children, but will also improve self-confidence of the disadvantaged child in the school environment.

The Environmental Education Act was passed by the 93d Congress with my support. This legislation is designed to promote among citizens an awareness and understanding of the environment, our relationship to it, and the concern and responsible action necessary to improve the quality of life.

XIII. VETERANS

The record of the 93d Congress in helping our Nation's deserving veterans was very constructive. Recognizing the adverse effects of inflation on veterans' compensation, Congress enacted the Disability Compensation and Survivor Benefits Act, which I actively supported and cosponsored. This bill was signed into law in May 1974, and provides cost-of-living increases in the rates of disability compensation for service-oriented, disabled veterans ranging from 15 to 18 percent. Provisions of the new law also provide a cost-of-living increase in dependency and indemnity compensation of 17 percent for widows and children of deceased veterans.

In May 1974, the 93d Congress passed another important veterans bill which I cosponsored. This legislation extended from 8 to 10 years the period a veteran or eligible wife or widow may use their GI educational benefits. This bill was signed into law on May 31, 1974—Public Law 93-293.

The Veterans and Survivors Pension Adjustment Act was approved in the latter stages of the 93d Congress. This significant enactment, which became law over the veto of the President, increases veterans' educational benefits by 22.7 percent and extends the entitlement period for undergraduates from 36 to 45 months, among other provisions. I was a cosponsor of this legislation and voted to override the President's veto.

Other significant veterans legislation that became law during the 93d Congress included: Increased coverage under servicemen's group life insurance, adjustment in veterans' and survivors' death pensions benefits, increased benefits for the purchase of specially equipped automobiles for disabled veterans, and modifications in the veterans' home loan program.

XIV. AGRICULTURE

During the 93d Congress a number of laws were enacted that will have a considerable impact on the agricultural sector of our economy.

One of the major bills enacted was the omnibus farm bill. This proposal, which is now public law, extended certain aspects of the present farm program and initiated the target price concept to replace Government subsidy payments. I supported these initiatives and amendments to repeal the wheat certificate program or bread tax, and procedures to limit the total payment to an individual producer under cotton, feed grains, and wheat programs to $20,000.

The 93d Congress also passed the emergency livestock credit bill to assist the livestock industry. This new law permits Government guarantees up to 80 percent of losses on loans made by private lending institutions to farmers and ranchers who breed, raise, fatten, or market beef and dairy cattle, hogs, sheep, goats, chickens, and turkeys. These loans, at full market interest rates, have already had a positive impact in stabilizing this important sector of our agricultural economy.

An independent Commodity Futures Trading Commission was created by enactment of Public Law 93-463, which I supported in the Senate. This new Commission regulation of commodity futures markets trading, which I referred to in section I of this report, will protect our farmers, industrial commodity users, and investors. The Commodity Exchange Authority also will be an important watchdog in curbing speculation which drives prices up for consumers.

The food stamp program was extended in the 93d Congress, and legislation was enacted to provide Federal payment of 50 percent of State administrative costs of the program. However, if States are to receive additional assistance for administrative costs, they must insure that the money is used to hire competent personnel to effectively manage this program. In the past year, the State of Ohio wasted money at a rate of $13 to $20 million annually in misadministration of the food stamp program alone. Under an amendment I offered to this legislation, if the Secretary of Agriculture determines that a State is not making an effort to manage its program effectively by hiring an adequate number of personnel and controlling administrative expenditures, funds for administration assistance and the food stamp program will be withheld. In addition, each State must report at least annually to the Secretary on the effectiveness of the program's administration. These requirements should insure that the food stamp program is managed effectively and that further abuses are prevented.

The World Food Conference focused much-needed attention on the world hunger problems and the ever-increasing world population. Inflation, coupled with the shortage of fertilizer and farmland, and high population growth rates, has contributed to the world food supply problems. The Green Revolution in 1967 helped to avert famine for a few years, but now inflation and world population are again growing faster than food production. As a member of the Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs, I have been made quite aware of the proportions of the major world hunger crisis.

Unfortunately, the unfavorable weather this year cut short our expectation of record harvest of grains in the United States, but we still have the fourth largest crop in our Nation's history. We have continued to export wheat and feed and grains, contingent on the availability of the grain here at home. Closer monitoring of exports is necessary, however, so that we are not caught by another Russian grain deal. As I mentioned in the section on the economy, steps have been taken to establish such safeguards.

Achieving world food security will require large-scale cooperation between food exporting and importing countries to bring population growth and food production into better balance.

In our own country, the Select Committee on Nutrition has focused attention on the need for nutrition education, both in schools, in food labeling, and through better communication to the public. The National Nutrition Conference, sponsored by the select committee, concentrated on the areas of nutrition and food availability, government, health, the consumer and special groups.

The select committee will have to play an important role in the 94th Congress in developing our national nutrition policy and in educating Americans about the possible solutions critical to this problem.

XV. CIVIL RIGHTS AND LIBERTIES

New heads of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission—EEOC—and U.S. Commission on Civil Rights were confirmed by the Senate during the 93d Congress with particular attention given to the EEOC. Besides conducting a very thorough confirmation hearing process regarding the new EEOC appointee, the Senate Labor Committee requested a General Accounting Office—GAO—review of procedures of the Commission. Instructions were also given to the GAO to suggest alternatives to certain current policies and methods of operation of the Commission. This review was completed by the GAO during the second session of the 93d Congress and hopefully will serve as a basis for improved performance by the EEOC, especially in alleviating their massive case backlog.

Congressional employment practices.—The question of employment discrimination in the Congress was an issue that surfaced during the 93d Congress. Information appeared in the media that certain congressional offices were deliberately excluding minority applicants and women from employment positions through discriminatory screening use of the Congressional Placement Office. I was shocked by such disclosures and requested that an investigation be conducted into the allegations. As a result of my request and that of a number of my colleagues, such an investigation was conducted. Its findings revealed that a number of discriminatory actions had in fact occurred. Placement Office regulations were subsequently changed to prohibit job placement discrimination and steps are being considered to institute internal procedures within the Congress to insure that all job applicants are presented with equal employment opportunities. Such initiatives, I believe, are absolutely crucial as the Congress must provide leadership and live by the same standards that have been set for the rest of the country.

Busing.—School desegregation and the busing continued to be a very difficult civil rights and liberties problem for this Congress and the country. Since the Supreme Court decision in Brown v. Board of Education (347 U.S. 483) in 1954, there have been numerous conflicting lower court decisions interpreting Brown—many of these decisions have caused great confusion and bitterness. The new comprehensive education bill adopted by this Congress became involved in these misunderstandings and confusion over the law. A deadlock developed between the House and Senate with regard to a prohibition on cross district busing. Fortunately during the second session of the 93d Congress the Supreme Court clarified many of the conflicting lower court decisions on this issue when it decided the Detroit case, Milliken v. Bradley (No. 73-434). The Court held that interdistrict busing was inappropriate where there is no showing of violation by districts that are sought to be drawn into a busing plan to remedy segregation in a particular district. A metropolitan area remedy will not be required the Court concluded, unless there is metropolitan area-wide discrimination.

The Congress modified the education busing bill provision to include this holding by the Court, and subsequently passed the Education Act legislation. I supported this compromise.

Right to privacy.—Citizens' right to privacy was also a major issue before this Congress. Upon learning of the abuses of Watergate, especially the use of IRS tax information, President Ford responded to congressional concerns and signed an Executive order to strictly limit access to income tax returns. While this was a constructive start, statutory protections are necessary in that Executive orders can be withdrawn or modified without congressional consent. I cosponsored a bill that would impose such statutory protections, but unfortunately the Congress did not approve this measure. I am hopeful that action will be taken in this area by the 94th Congress.

Privacy issues were also reflected in the new comprehensive education bill mentioned elsewhere in this report. Provisions of this new law, modified at the end of the Congress, deny Federal funds to any educational institution that prevents parental access to a child's school records or permits unauthorized release of the records. These provisions also apply to colleges and universities with students permitted to review their files excluding certain information such as letters of recommendation that were included before the effective date of this new law.

Restrictions and guideline procedures were established regarding Federal agency compilation of information and records on citizens. This new public law provides that individuals must be told by agencies on request whether or not there is a Government record on them, and if so, permit the individual access to any information not of a law enforcement nature.

Concern over possible misuse of criminal records led to the enactment of amendments to the Crime Control Act of 1973. These new public law provisions limit the use of criminal records and permit correction of erroneous data.

XVI. LEGAL SERVICES CORPORATION

The words "equal justice under law" inscribed on the face of the U.S. Supreme Court building are not just a catchy judicial phrase, they indicate an underlying principle upon which this country was founded. Equal access to the procedural system that considers an individual's rights and obligations is essential for all Americans regardless of their financial plight. Historically, however, such access has been provided for primarily by private lawyer-client relationships with the financial ability of the client to secure such an arrangement often the determining factor of the type, or even the existence, of such a relationship. This procedure presents serious obstacles to economically disadvantaged members of our society and is repugnant to the requirements of the Constitution. Attempts to correct this imbalance by the legal community have been advanced through the implementation of numerous legal aid and public defender programs since the early 1900's. These programs, developed internally within the legal profession, however, proved not numerous or broad enough in scope to adequately respond to the legal needs of the economically disadvantaged.

Recognizing these difficulties, I and many of my colleagues in the Congress sought creation of a nonpolitical independent legal services corporation. Finally, after over 4 years of research and work this Congress enacted a Legal Services Corporation proposal that was signed into law.

The act, which relieves the Office of Economic Opportunity of legal aid responsibilities, contains safeguards to prevent politicization of the corporation and contains a number of restrictions including prohibitions on lobbying and use of corporation funds, facilities, or personnel in partisan and nonpartisan political campaigns or elections. Through State advisory boards and corporation attorney selection procedures, bar organization are provided opportunities to participate in this program. Further, provisions are also included to permit experimentation with alternative delivery systems of legal services to the economically disadvantaged—such as voucher plans, and prepaid legal service arrangements.

This new corporation is scheduled to become operational early in 1975 after the members of the board of directors have been confirmed by the Senate. As a coauthor of this new law I am quite hopeful that it will significantly advance the ideal of equal justice under law for all Americans.

XVII. WAR POWERS

The framers of our Constitution granted Congress the power to declare war and charged the President with the responsibility for conducting hostilities once they have lawfully commenced.

Despite that constitutional mandate, there have been at least 165 instances during the history of this Nation when American Armed Forces have been committed abroad. On only five occasions, however, has war been declared by the United States. The last 20 years have witnessed a continued loss of the congressional war powers. At the same time, the Executive has taken an increasingly broad view of its prerogatives in this area. Under modern conditions, the irreversibility and the danger of Executive action without congressional authorization have accelerated to an unprecedented extent and therefore the concern for a constitutional check by Congress is enormously enlarged.

In responding to this problem, I joined in introducing legislation to define the situations in which the President could engage the Armed Forces of the United States without a declaration of war. Even within these defined situations the measure requires congressional review to install the necessary constitutional balance between the legislative and executive branches.

This proposal passed the Senate and House with overwhelming support, but was vetoed by the former President. The Congress voted to override his veto. I joined in voting for such an override based on my strong conviction that this legislation is vital in the formulation of American foreign policy. I consider it one of the most important public laws of the 93d Congress.

CXX—2660—Part 31

42199

XVIII. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Southeast Asia.—The 93d Congress began with considerable attention continuing to be directed toward Southeast Asia. Even with the negotiation of the Paris Peace Agreement in January of 1973, substantial questions remained as to U.S. involvement in this area of the world, especially in Laos and Cambodia. Finally, after protracted debate in the Senate and House, a compromise agreement was reached with the Executive regarding future levels of funding and prohibitions on U.S. military operations in Southeast Asia. I supported this compromise.

Unanswered questions still remain, however, regarding many of our men who are missing in action in this area of the world and I am greatly troubled by the lack of North Vietnamese cooperation on this issue. The 94th Congress must continue to be aware of this problem and press for better results.

Middle East.—The Middle East was a major concern of this Congress. With the outbreak of another war between Israel and her Arab neighbors in the fall of 1973, this country was placed in a very difficult position. Because the Arab States were the aggressors in this war and because massive Soviet arms deliveries to Egypt and Syria upset the balance of forces, I supported arms shipments to Israel. It was my position then, and it is my position now, that Israel must be assisted in her struggle to maintain her existence.

Partly as a result of U.S. arms shipments to Israel, the Arab countries imposed an oil boycott on the United States and any other so-called allies of Israel. The effects of Arab actions, still plague the world in the form of artificially high oil prices. Such coercive economic actions constitute international blackmail and cannot be permitted to interfere with legitimate U.S. foreign policy actions, whether it is Israel or any other country that is involved. The United States must develop a policy of greater resource independence, and every effort must be made to persuade consuming countries to formulate a unified policy to deal with such action. A counter cartel international organization should be considered by consuming countries to reduce consumption and take other necessary economic measures to deal with the tactics of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries—OPEC.

I am optimistic that greater stability will be brought to the Mideast through the negotiations undertaken by President Ford and Secretary of State Kissinger. In pursuing such negotiations it is important that the United States continue to support Israel's legitimate right to exist, and that this country also recognize and support the important efforts of President Sadat of Egypt in attempting to seek a permanent peaceful settlement of differences between Israel and her Arab neighbors.

Soviet Union-China.—The process of détente with the U.S.S.R. and the Peoples' Republic of China was also an important international issue in the 93d Congress. Liberalization of trade with both countries was significantly advanced through various treaties approved by the Senate.

The Trade Reform Act and its relationship to the Soviet policy toward the right of minority citizens, especially Russian Jews, to freely emigrate was a particularly significant advancement. As I mentioned in the section on the economy, I was a cosponsor and a strong supporter of this provision in the new trade bill. It appears, however, that the policy of the Soviet Government may not have been completely conveyed to the United States when this act was adopted. If it develops that the U.S.S.R. does not honor its pledge on emigration as understood by the Congress, reconsideration will be necessary regarding extension of foreign trade credits to the U.S.S.R. I hope that will not be necessary as increased trade benefits both parties.

The United States must not neglect its improved ties with the People's Republic of China by shifting too much attention to the Soviet Union. As I noted in an article in the New York Times editorial section during the summer of 1974, this country must be fully aware of the important role in the policy of détente to be played by China. This country must recognize the importance of the maintenance of Chinese security from Soviet attack and should not preclude the possibility of supplying defensive arms to the Peoples' Republic of China for such purpose.

NATO.—The record of the 93d Congress lack of participation in assisting the Executive in strengthening NATO and bringing about a peace settlement in Cyprus was deplorable. Unquestionably, Turkey and Greece both were wrong in certain respects in the Cyprus situation, but both nations are NATO members and important allies. To unfairly impose inflexible, harsh restrictions on one country, as the Congress did to Turkey, not only lessens considerably the chance for a negotiated peace settlement, but also works to destroy NATO. I hope that the new Congress will not continue to follow such an ill-advised policy on this issue.

CIA.—At the close of the 93d Congress, numerous allegations surfaced with respect to illegal activities on the part of the CIA. I was quite concerned by these allegations and I questioned the effectiveness of current congressional oversight procedures. Accordingly, I cosponsored legislation to establish a joint House-Senate committee to oversee CIA activities. Although this Congress did not enact this measure I am hopeful that action consistent with this proposal will occur during the 94th Congress.

World hunger.—The problem of world hunger was another major international problem considered by the 93d Congress. I supported the convening of the World Food Conference, referred to elsewhere in this report, and I hope more countries will join the United States in providing much-needed relief to the millions of people in need of food in northern Africa and the Indian subcontinent. The oil-producing nations in particular must be encouraged to assist in this effort through aid and low-cost loans.

Of the many specific measures that were adopted in the international area by the Senate during the 93d Congress, I believe the following merit brief mention:

Enactment of a foreign disaster assistance bill providing emergency relief to Pakistan, Nicaragua, Ethiopia, and other African nations;

Authorization of funding for operation of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency to seek further limitations and agreements on the nuclear and conventional arms race; and Approval of International Court of Justice Resolutions, which I coauthored, strengthening the role of the World Court in settling international disputes through peaceful legal procedures.

XIX. MASS TRANSIT—TRANSPORTATION SERVICES

Viable mass transportation systems are essential to the country. Such systems not only minimize pollution and conserve energy, but also provide needed transportation for the young, the elderly, the handicapped, and the economically disadvantaged who cannot afford to own and operate an automobile. I have consistently supported legislation to provide the funds necessary to improve local mass transportation systems, and to eliminate the bias in Federal programs toward unnecessary highway construction.

Mass transit funds.—The 93d Congress took a major step forward in this area by passing a 6-year bill to help pay for both capital investments and operating expenditures of urban mass transportation systems. However, as I pointed out with an amendment on the Senate floor, it is our responsibility to monitor the use of this program carefully to prevent communities from wasting available funds.

Rail service.—I have been quite active in urging expansion and increased use of our Nation's rail passenger system. My proposal to link Cleveland and Toledo with Amtrak service from Chicago to Boston was approved after almost a year of study and research. I have also proposed a number of other improvements in Ohio rail service. They are mentioned in section xxv of this report.

I authored legislation to amend the Rail Passenger Act to permit rail transportation of recreational vehicles such as motorized campers. This proposal, patterned after the highly successful auto-train, would both conserve fuel and permit extensive vacation travel for many Americans.

The serious lack of rail passenger equipment was the basis of another bill I authored. This legislative proposal would amend section 402 of the Rail Passenger Act so that under circumstances of urgent need, participating railroads must sell or lease to Amtrak any equipment which is necessary for rail passenger service.

The financial situation of our Nation's railroads definitely is quite serious as evidenced by the bankruptcy of the Penn Central and other major rail systems. The 93d Congress reacted to this crisis by enacting the Regional Rail

Reorganization Act to create a new private corporation, Conrail, to operate the rail systems in the East and Midwest. While this legislation certainly is preferable to nationalization, it still leaves a number of unanswered questions. I would have much preferred adoption of my bill, the Modern Rail Transportation Act, which would have concentrated on elimination of discriminatory freight rates, termination of unproductive work rules through joint labor-management attrition agreements, and abandonment of uneconomical rail lines.

Maritime service.—Greater use of our Nation's inland waterways is not only quite desirable economically, but also beneficial from an energy conservation and environmental viewpoint. The St. Lawrence Seaway system connecting with the Great Lakes is particularly attractive and should be utilized to a greater extent in our Nation's commerce. Consistent with this objective, I introduced legislation in the 93d Congress to establish a Great Lakes Regional Office of the Maritime Administration. I also worked for the elimination of discriminatory Interstate Commerce Commission rate structures that favor east coast ports rather than closer, more economical ports on the Great Lakes.

The 93d Congress left many challenges in the mass transit area, especially in the utilization of rail service. I have proposed a number of specific programs for Ohio, referred to elsewhere, and will continue to pursue these proposals in the new Congress. I also am examining a number of transit and rail alternatives such as Light Rail and hope to make specific proposals in this area during the 94th Congress.

XX. WELFARE REFORM

I am extremely disappointed that Congress has not agreed upon how to deal with our welfare problems in a meaningful and economic way. Americans have had enough of the aid for dependent children program, which is governed by exhaustive administrative rules of over 1,000 local agencies and departments. Until recently, the present system was increasing in total cost to the States at a rate of over 100 percent every 3 years. The current system still does provide, however, such fluctuations as $403 per month for a family of four receiving welfare in some States, and $60 per month in other States. Legislation to standardize welfare benefits at a responsible level and to provide incentives to encourage working rather than reliance on welfare definitely should be considered by the new Congress.

Close scrutinization also is necessary to ensure that the other individual assistance programs work well. My amendment to the Food Stamp Act, now law, should encourage closer Federal review of State food stamp programs. I have also called on the Government to take the stern actions needed to assure that medicare and medicaid nursing home facilities meet fire protection standards.

The 93d Congress did take action to restructure the Office of Economic Opportunity by combining a number of overlapping programs and by placing former OEO programs within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

A great deal more needs to be accomplished in the welfare reform area. Programs such as supplementary security income—SSI—referred to in section VI of this report, must be reviewed and restructured. Greater efforts must be undertaken to eliminate the fraud and cheating from our Nation's welfare programs that each cost taxpayers millions of dollars.

These problems must receive highest priority for review in the 94th Congress.

XXI. CRIME—JUDICIARY

The increasing problems of crime and respect for the law were frequent subjects mentioned in correspondence I received from constituents during the 93d Congress. The record of the 93d Congress in responding to these concerns I believe was excellent.

Watergate.—As the disclosures in the media continued to develop the serious questions arising out of the trial of the individuals who broke into the Watergate, it became quite evident that a thorough investigation into many of these allegations was necessary. The Senate responded by creating a select committee to investigate the matter. The Watergate Committee on balance performed extremely well in revealing to the Nation the extent of illegal activities that were involved in the 1972 Presidential campaign and related activities. Unquestionably, the research and record developed by the Watergate Committee served as the foundation of the House Judiciary Committee's excellent work in the impeachment area. The committee also provided the Special Prosecutor with helpful information regarding subsequent trials. I supported the resolution creating the select committee and the subsequent resolutions adopted for its extension.

Some commentators already are labeling the 93d Congress as the "Watergate Congress." I am not certain I necessarily like that label, but I do believe this Congress, without question, fulfilled its constitutional duties of checking the abuse of power by the Executive, and in fact, may be recorded by history as reestablishing constitutional balance in the relationship between the President and the Congress.

Special Prosecutor legislation.—Not all congressional attention was directed toward the Watergate Committee. After the dismissal of the first Special Prosecutor, considerable debate developed regarding implementation of a statutory procedure to guarantee the independence of the office of Special Prosecutor. A sizeable number of my colleagues thought the best approach was to adopt legislation permitting members of the Judicial branch to appoint a Special Prosecutor. I disagreed, arguing that while I certainly thought statutory protections were necessary, basic separation of powers provisions of the Constitution that place appointment power in the executive branch could not be disregarded.

I proposed an alternative approach authorizing the Attorney General instead of the President to appoint a Special

December 20, 1974

Prosecutor with strict statutory provisions protecting the independence of the Prosecutor and prohibiting his arbitrary removal from office.

The Senate Judiciary Committee reported both my bill and the judicial appointment measure. Fortunately, with the subsequent appointment of a new Special Prosecutor, a situation never developed which necessitated a constitutional confrontation with the Executive on this issue.

Significant non-Watergate measures were also considered by the 93d Congress in the judicial area. The more important include:

Enactment of comprehensive reform of copyright laws;

Extension of the Drug Enforcement Administration funding;

Establishment of uniform rules of evidence for the Federal courts; and Senate enactment of legislation providing for application of a mandatory death penalty for certain Federal crimes involving murder.

XXII. GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION AND OPERATION

Regulatory reform.—The record of the 93d Congress could be considerably improved regarding the efficiency and operation of the Federal Government. As I stated in the "Consumer Affairs" section of this report, extensive restructuring is necessary in the operation of our governmental agencies.

Consider the recent example of the Interstate Commerce Commission's regulation of the transportation of fresh dressed poultry in interstate commerce. After the Supreme Court ruled the ICC had no jurisdiction over this agricultural commodity, shipping prices dropped by 33 percent.

The Federal Trade Commission's Carter's Little Liver Pill case took 16 years for disposition.

I could proceed with pages of similar examples. There is no question that consumers of America should be outraged by such regulatory procedures.

In response to this problem I supported a comprehensive regulatory reform bill to achieve a thorough review of these agencies and testified before the Government Operations Committee to stress the need for enactment of such a proposal. Since the 93d Congress did not act in this area, such reforms must be a priority for the new Congress.

Postal Service.—Problems continued to plague the operation of the new Postal Service with delivery in many respects very poor. I believe it is extremely difficult to justify contemplated further increases in first-class mail rates in light of such inadequate delivery service. The 94th Congress should consider holding oversight hearings as this is the most effective way to check such abuses since increases in postal rates are no longer subject to congressional approval.

Two important positive developments did occur, however, in the Government reorganization and operation area during the 93d Congress:

FBI.—A one time 10-year term was established for appointments to the directorship of the FBI with the Federal mandatory retirement age of 70 made applicable to such a position. This new restructuring should help to insure that no one individual in the future uses this extremely important Government agency post in any improper manner; and

D.C. home rule.—The other important positive development in this area was the passage of legislation providing for self-government of the District of Columbia, and the election of the mayor and city council. This fall, in fulfillment of this law—Public Law 93-198—the citizens of Washington, D.C., elected their first mayor in almost 100 years. The residents of the Federal City are deeply concerned about their city's condition and future. It is time they had a voice in the election of its government officials.

XXIII. DAYLIGHT SAVING TIME

Reacting to the energy crisis, the first session of the 93d Congress enacted year-round daylight saving time. This law, the Emergency Daylight Saving Time Energy Conservation Act of 1973, I argued, would place sections of Ohio on the western edge of the Eastern Time Zone in the dark well into the morning hours and thus create safety risks to children going to school. Further, I questioned the energy savings of such proposals. Accordingly, I voted against the bill.

Experience proved that there were indeed problems with this plan. Shortly after its inception in January of 1974, a number of tragedies involving schoolchildren on their way to school in the dark occurred. Substantial inconvenience was experienced by people throughout the country. A poll in Ohio indicated citizens by a 2 to 1 margin favored repeal of winter DST. Additionally, reports from the U.S. Department of Transportation failed to reveal that any substantial saving of electrical energy had occurred. The minimal conservation results that were obtained were predominantly savings of coal—of which there is no shortage. In fact, the study found that gasoline consumption actually increased since many parents drove their children to school instead of letting them walk to school or wait for buses in the dark.

Responding to these problems, I introduced legislation to exempt Ohio from winter DST. In March of 1974, I introduced an amendment in the Senate seeking repeal of winter DST. This amendment was defeated by a vote of 48 to 43.

Finally in September of 1974, the 93d Congress acted. The new measure, which has been signed into law, repeals winter DST from the last Sunday in October of 1974 through the last Sunday in February 1975.

XXIV. DISASTER RELIEF

The Ohio tornadoes of 1974 tragically reminded all of us that one of our citizens' times of greatest need is in the aftermath of a natural disaster. Unfortunately, the Federal disaster relief program has not always met these needs very rationally.

Until April 1973, the Government was willing to pay $5,000 grants and 1 percent loans to disaster victims regardless of need. An elderly person with a low fixed income whose home had been washed away was eligible for funds to undertake repairs or find new housing on the same basis as a millionaire whose tennis courts had been damaged. I authored legislation to apportion the available assistance based on the needs of the disaster victims. My proposal passed the Senate, but was rejected by the House of Representatives.

Then, in an overreaction to program deficiencies, in April 1973, Congress abolished all assistance for disaster victims other than 5-percent loans. This was done despite the generous authorizations made for aid to victims of disasters overseas, such as the Nicaraguan earthquake. Thus, when the devastating tornadoes hit Ohio and eight other States in April 1974, there was no effective Federal disaster relief program. With the unfortunate experiences of these tornado victims before the Congress, I renewed my efforts for adoption of my Emergency Disaster Recovery Act.

Finally, a program similar to my proposal, was adopted by the 93d Congress. Although there were administrative rules at first which made the program too restrictive, this new public law is a step in the right direction.

The same new law, the Disaster Relief Act Amendments of 1974, contained other important provisions such as expanded authority to make loans and grants to communities whose tax base has been destroyed, authority for psychological counseling of disaster victims, more local flexibility in the expenditure of Federal funds for rebuilding, and a new, long-term disaster recovery program. Unfortunately, however, passage of the law was not the same as delivering immediate assistance to Xenia, the flooded areas along the Great Lakes and other areas suffering from disasters.

In terms of avoiding both human suffering and Federal expense, the best answer to natural disasters is preparedness, rather than disaster relief. The new disaster relief law beefs up programs along these lines, such as tornado warning programs. The 93d Congress, however, left a great number of questions unanswered in this area and I am hopeful the new Congress will address them.

XXV. HELPING OHIO

During the 93d Congress I added a new district office in Toledo. The new Toledo office joined my previously existing State offices in Cleveland, Columbus, and Cincinnati, and will serve as a full-time extension of my Washington office.

Beginning in early 1975, I intend to transfer most of my constituent case-work functions back to my State offices to maximize the effectiveness of this effort. Such a constituent oriented system will permit me and my staff to have greater personal contact with the people of Ohio and better assist them in participating in Federal programs. This staff arrangement will also provide improved liaison between Federal departments and agencies and units of State and local government.

With regard to obtaining Federal assistance and grants for Ohio, I have been extensively involved in seeing that the interests and needs of the citizens of the State are represented. Although there were hundreds of grants and programs which I helped obtain for Ohio during the 93d Congress, some of the more important developments included:

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Disaster relief assistance.—In the aftermath of the devastating tornadoes which destroyed homes and businesses throughout southwest Ohio, including a large part of the city of Xenia, my activities increased in the area of disaster relief. Calls for help ranged from problems with Small Business Administration loans to long-term recovery needs in the area of urban renewal and economic redevelopment. Recovery efforts are still taking place in Xenia where I am continuing to cooperate with city officials whenever needed to insure maximum Federal participation.

Rail passenger service.—The improvement of Amtrak service to Ohio has been one of my major concerns throughout this Congress. Together with tremendous support of people from northern Ohio, and the cooperation of 65 Members of Congress, I was successful in obtaining a firm promise of rail service for Cleveland and Toledo in 1975.

I have also been active in urging the State of Ohio to cooperate with Amtrak in establishing fast, modern rail service in the Cleveland-Columbus-Dayton-Cincinnati corridor and the Cleveland-Youngstown-Pittsburgh corridor. I hope that, through joint Federal-State cooperation, such a proposal will become operative in the near future.

National park.—I sponsored and the Congress approved legislation to establish the Cuyahoga Valley National Recreation Area. Notwithstanding the great need for this park, considerable doubt existed whether the President would sign this congressional enactment into law. A number of his advisers were prepared to recommend that this measure be vetoed on the basis that it may set a precedent requiring every State to have such a national park. I discussed this legislation thoroughly with President Ford and as I was writing this report I was extremely pleased to learn that the President had signed this proposal into law.

The new park, when completed, will comprise 20,000 acres along the Cuyahoga River and the Old Ohio Canal between Akron and Cleveland. Historic in setting and near to a major population center, this park has long been needed in a State that previously had no national park. With the ever-present need for gasoline fuel economy this new park will become even more significant to the residents of Ohio.

Education and research.—Ohio has long been recognized as an educational trendsetter. Growing in excellence have been the multidisciplinary universities and research centers. Of significance to Ohioans has been the active response of the medical research communities to the need for better cancer care. In the past few years I have supported and encouraged cancer research in Ohio and have helped in obtaining much needed Federal grants to its major universities from the National Cancer Institute. I have stressed the need for Ohio to be designated as the location of the next comprehensive cancer center, and will continue to support expanded Federal participation in the fight against cancer.

THE AGENDA AHEAD

The 94th Congress will face an agenda of critical importance to the country. Immediate attention will be required in the area of economic policy. If recessionary trends continue, strong and effective action will be necessary to stimulate production and employment. Consideration of tax reforms and incentives for increased capital investment certainly would be constructive starting points. Even though the uncomfortable problem of inflation may remain at too high a level, employment and gross national product statistics must not be permitted to plunge at their current rate. Under no circumstances can the country's economy be permitted to fall into a depression.

Continued congressional emphasis must be directed to energy conservation and development. Comprehensive efforts must continue to be undertaken to find alternative sources of energy from coal gasification, geothermal heat conversion, harnessing of ocean wave power and solar energy. Further action must be taken regarding the utilization of new methods of mass transit with particular attention directed to increased use of rail service. Existing sources of energy such as Alaskan oil fields, offshore ocean oil shelves, and coal deposits, must be developed within realistic environmental-conservation constraints. The objective of reducing excessive dependence on foreign supply of energy must be pursued concurrently with the goal of persuading producing nations to take a more responsible approach to the price levels placed on oil.

The ever increasing financial and social difficulties of welfare assistance must be addressed. The working men and women of the country cannot continually be asked to contribute their earnings to our current poorly structured programs.

The 94th Congress must constructively participate in reducing military expenditures for nuclear weapons consistent with continuing strategic arms limitation talks with the Soviet Union and other nations of nuclear capability. The process of détente must continue to be pursued with the U.S.S.R., the People's Republic of China, and Third World nations pursuant to realistic constraints and national interests of the United States. Responsible cooperation by the Congress with the Executive will be necessary to maintain a strong NATO, particularly with respect to solving the differences between member countries Greece and Turkey, and also to achieve a permanent peace in the Mideast.

The unanswered problems and issues before the 93d Congress must become the challenges of the 94th. Action will be directed to: Federal agency restructuring, no-fault insurance, prison reform, national health legislation, continuation of Federal revenue sharing, tax reform, public employee bargaining rights, workmen's compensation standards, land use planning, and, an issue perhaps crucial to obtaining meaningful action in any of the above areas, reform of the internal procedures of the Congress.

The responsibilities of the 94th Congress will be considerable and, if recent history is an accurate guide, the performance of the legislative branch will be deficient in many crucial areas. To the extent my vote and moral influence can be exercised, however, I pledge to the people of Ohio to do my utmost to achieve constructive solutions to the many problems facing this great country.

TRIBUTE TO TOM GETTYS ON HIS RETIREMENT

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ROONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, this 93d Congress that is rapidly drawing to a close has more than its share of retiring Members. One of these is the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina, my friend the Honorable THOMAS SMITHWICK GETTYS.

Long active in the civic, educational, and governmental affairs of South Carolina, Tom GETTYS has provided his people in South Carolina with the kind of representation that they deserve and have a right to expect. Tom's advice and counsel will be sorely missed in this House.

Tom, you know that you have the Rooney clan's best wishes for a long, healthy, and peaceful retirement. Godspeed to you and yours.

HON. EDITH GREEN

HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to pay tribute to my dear friend and distinguished colleague the gentle lady from Oregon, EDITH GREEN. Mr. Speaker, any definitive account of Federal aid to education will describe in detail Mrs. GREEN's herculean efforts in this field. She has been the pioneer, a national leader in education. Mrs. GREEN has brought to the all important Appropriations Committee the same dedication and legislative creativity for which she became known in the field of education. Mr. Speaker, it has been my pleasure to serve in this body with EDITH GREEN for 20 years. No member of the Congress is held in higher regard for careful and conscientious analysis of legislation. Countless times I have requested her wise counsel and advice.

Mr. Speaker, I have said many times that education is the Nation's No. 1 priority. With this in mind, I am hopeful that Mrs. GREEN will remain active in public service so that we can continue to benefit from her judgment and expertise. We wish for our good friend EDITH GREEN every happiness in the future and the best always.

December 20, 1974

TRIBUTE TO THE HONORABLE EDITH GREEN

HON. JAMIE L. WHITTEN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 18, 1974

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to join with my colleagues in paying tribute to one of the outstanding Members of Congress in the Nation's history, EDITH GREEN, Congresswoman from the State of Oregon. Many people have served in the Congress, but I do not believe we have had any who possessed more ability than my friend, EDITH GREEN. Her knowledge, talent for expression, and her ability and success in her undertakings have not been excelled during my experience here.

The untiring efforts, backed by an astute comprehension of the field of education gained through 12 years of practical experience, and an innate wisdom and profound interest earned EDITH GREEN the esteem of her colleagues. Great benefit has been brought to education by her strong commitment and good judgment.

I agree with the wonderful statements made by my friends and colleagues and join with them in wishing for EDITH GREEN and her family many years of good health and happiness.

A FAREWELL WORD FOR A FRIEND—TOM GETTYS

HON. JOHN M. SLACK

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 19, 1974

Mr. SLACK. Mr. Speaker, the end of each Congress brings a parting of friends, and the final days of the 93d Congress means a fond farewell for my friend, Tom GETTYS of South Carolina.

There are all too few of us who have the natural capacity to develop and maintain friendships even in the stress of disagreement, an invaluable asset to calm deliberations. We will look far to find another such ambassador of good will as Tom GETTYS.

During his 10 years of service in the House it was frequently noted that Tom had not an enemy. His high principle, devotion to his country, and its traditions, and readiness to serve his people without reservation were all recognized by his colleagues. Yet, while holding to good humor at all times, he established himself as an energetic, determined Member of the House, unfailing in his commitments to his responsibilities.

Tom enjoyed his work and enjoyed the company of his colleagues, so his own presence was always enjoyable. My best wishes go with him in his retirement, and may this coming time of relaxation and reflection afford him every satisfaction in recalling the great fund of friendship and respect he is leaving behind.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

THE NIXON PARDON—THE UNANSWERED QUESTIONS

HON. ELIZABETH HOLTZMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Speaker, although 1974 is drawing to an end, many unanswered questions remain about one of the central events of this year—President Ford's shameful pardoning of Richard Nixon.

The hearing held by the Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Criminal Justice, of which I am a member, did not resolve the matter. I enclose for the Record a list of unanswered questions together with a letter I wrote to Representative WILLIAM HUNGATE, chairman of the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice, outlining the issues which remain.

Let me also note for the Record that a number of these unanswered questions have appeared in the press from time to time since the date our subcommittee held its pardon hearing. Others were posed at or before the hearing. President Ford has had ample opportunity to address himself to these questions. I hope that he will make it his business to do so promptly; otherwise suspicion and doubt will fester in the public's mind for many years to come. The chapter on the pardon can only be closed if the Congress is willing to pursue the truth relentlessly and if the President is willing to be truly forthcoming.

The articles follow:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., November 21, 1974.
Hon. WILLIAM HUNGATE,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Justice, Committee on the Judiciary, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I had planned to send you, at the first lull in the Rockefeller hearings, my complete analysis of President Ford's testimony before the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice. Because of your intention to dispose of the resolutions of inquiry tomorrow, I would like to advise you of the conclusions which I have reached at this time.

President Ford volunteered to appear before the Subcommittee to answer questions contained in resolutions of inquiry which sought in essence to learn the facts surrounding the issuance of a pardon to Richard Nixon. A careful analysis of the transcript indicates that President Ford's testimony was inadequate for the purposes of our hearing. First, President Ford did not answer all the questions contained in both resolutions of inquiry. Second, questions that I posed to President Ford during the hearing still remain unanswered. Third, President Ford's testimony before the Subcommittee raised important additional questions, including the substance of reports received about Richard Nixon's health and whether any commitment was made that President Ford would issue a pardon to Richard Nixon in the event he resigned. Fourth, many, if not most, of the questions that were raised by the pardon but were not posed during the hearing—including those contained in Committee staff memoranda—remain unanswered today.

I have attached for your review a memorandum which analyzes this matter in further detail. Because of time pressures it is not complete.

In my judgment to decide at this time that the pardon of Richard Nixon is a closed chapter in the history of this country lies in the face of the record of our hearing itself and the awareness of the American public which knows that the major questions surrounding the pardon are still unanswered. A hearing of less than two hours on its face seems barely capable of disposing of this serious matter.

Sincerely,

ELIZABETH HOLTZMAN,
Member of Congress.

MEMORANDUM ANALYZING THE TESTIMONY OF PRESIDENT FORD BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL JUSTICE OF THE HOUSE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

I. PRESIDENT FORD'S FAILURE TO ANSWER QUESTIONS CONTAINED IN RESOLUTIONS OF INQUIRY (H. RES. 1367 AND H. RES. 1370)

A. Question 2 (H. Res. 1367) calls for information regarding whether Alexander Haig discussed a pardon with Richard Nixon or his representatives during the week of August 4, and, if so, the nature of any promises or conditions made, and further to provide any tapes or transcripts of such conversations. President Ford answered the question only in terms of his personal knowledge. The Resolution, however, calls for him to provide information respecting conversations of Mr. Haig, whether or not President Ford was present at any such conversations. The question is thus unanswered.

B. Question 4 (H. Res. 1367) calls in essence for a list of all subsequent discussions or negotiations with Richard Nixon or his representatives respecting a pardon and the times and locations of such conversations. No such complete catalogue was supplied to the Committee. The question remains unanswered.

C. Question 7 (H. Res. 1367) calls on the President to supply the facts or legal authorities given to President Ford by attorneys before making his decision to pardon Richard Nixon. Although President Ford admitted having consulted with Phillip Buchen, Benton Becker and Jonathan Marsh, President Ford failed to provide the Committee with the facts or legal authorities (if any) that they gave to him.

D. Question 8 (H. Res. 1367) calls on the President to provide the suggested language of any statement requested from Mr. Nixon in exchange for the pardon. Although President Ford admitted that a statement was received from Mr. Nixon and that Phillip Buchen had requested a statement of contrition, President Ford failed to provide "the suggested or requested language" called for in the question.

E. Question 2 (H. Res. 1370) calls for information or facts given to President Ford respecting the mental or physical health of Richard Nixon. Although acknowledging that he had received information or facts respecting the mental or physical health of Richard Nixon, President Ford failed to describe the nature of the information or facts given to him. This question is thus unanswered.

II. THE QUESTIONS POSED TO PRESIDENT FORD BY REPRESENTATIVE HOLTZMAN DURING THE COURSE OF HIS EXAMINATION WHICH REMAIN UNANSWERED

A. How can you explain having pardoned Richard Nixon without specifying any of the crimes for which he was pardoned?

B. How can you explain pardoning Richard Nixon without obtaining any acknowledgment of guilt from him?

*Shortly after the hearing, President Ford advised the press that he would be willing to make public any tape recordings of conversations he had with Richard Nixon. To date, he has not done so.

December 20, 1974

C. How do you explain the failure to consult the Attorney General of the United States with respect to the issuance of the pardon even though in your confirmation hearings you had indicated that the Attorney General's opinion would be critical in any decision to pardon the former President?

D. How can this extraordinary haste in which the pardon was decided on and the secrecy with which it was carried out be explained?

E. How can you explain the fact that the pardon of Richard Nixon was accompanied by an agreement with respect to the tapes which in essence, in the public mind, hampered the Special Prosecutor's access to these materials and was done, also in the public's mind, in disregard of the public's right to know the full story about Richard Nixon's misconduct in office?

F. Why was Benton Becker used to represent the interests of the United States in negotiating a tapes agreement when at that very time he was under investigation by the United States for possible criminal charges?

G. How can you explain not having consulted Leon Jaworski, the Special Prosecutor, before approving the tapes agreement?

H. To alleviate the suspicions that the reason for the pardon and the simultaneous tapes agreement was to insure that the tape recordings between yourself and Richard Nixon never came out in public, would you be willing to turn over to this Subcommittee all tape recordings of conversations between yourself and Richard Nixon?

III. QUESTIONS ARISING FROM PRESIDENT FORD'S TESTIMONY

A. You testified that on August 1 "you had a meeting in the afternoon with General Alexander Haig which 'include[d]' references to a possible pardon from Mr. Nixon." Please state everything that Alexander Haig said to you with respect to any pardon for Mr. Nixon and state everything that you said to Alexander Haig respecting that pardon.

B. Did you tell Alexander Haig at that meeting that you could make no commitment to pardon Richard Nixon? Did you tell Alexander Haig at that meeting that you thought it was inadvisable for Richard Nixon to pardon himself or others associated with the Watergate matter?

C. At that meeting did you ask Alexander Haig what kind of pardon was contemplated by option No. 6—was it to be a pardon issued before indictment? Was it to be a full, free and absolute pardon? Within what time period was it contemplated that that pardon would be issued? What was General Haig's response?

D. You testified that you met with Mr. St. Clair on August 2, 1974, and "pointed out to him the various options mentioned" by General Haig on the preceding day. What did you say about these options and what did he say about these options? What did you say and what did he say about the likelihood or desirability of Mr. Nixon's resigning? What did you say and what did he say about the likelihood or desirability of your pardoning Mr. Nixon if he resigned?

E. Did you state in words or substance to Mr. St. Clair that you could make no commitment to giving Richard Nixon a pardon if he were to resign? Did Mr. St. Clair discuss with you any legal questions concerning the validity of a pardon for Richard Nixon, including the validity of a pardon issued before indictment and the validity of a blanket pardon? If so, what did he say?

F. In discussing the options with Mr. St. Clair, what advice did he give you and what recommendations did he make to you with respect to pardoning Richard Nixon after he resigned? What recommendations and advice did Mr. St. Clair give to you respecting the disposition of Presidential tapes or papers in this conversation on August 2?

G. What did you tell Mr. St. Clair your intentions were with respect to issuing the pardon for Richard Nixon? Did you state to Mr. St. Clair that you thought it would not be in the national interest if Mr. Nixon pardoned himself or any of the Watergate defendants before resigning?

H. What was said about the possibility that Mr. Nixon would resign in the absence of any pardon? What was said about the likelihood or desirability of Mr. Nixon's pardoning himself and/or any of the Watergate defendants?

I. What did Mr. St. Clair say about the need for a pardon for Richard Nixon? What did Mr. St. Clair say about the likelihood that Mr. Nixon would be prosecuted or convicted? What did Mr. St. Clair say about the nature of any criminal acts that Mr. Nixon might be prosecuted for? Did Mr. St. Clair express a view as to the criminal guilt of Mr. Nixon and, if so, what did he say and what did you say?

J. What was said about the disposition of tape recordings and the documents and papers of the Nixon presidency, transition financing and legal representation for Mr. Nixon after his resignation?

K. Between the time of your meeting with Alexander Haig on the afternoon of August 1, 1974, and your telephone conversation with him the next day, did you have conversations with any persons about the pardon other than those about which you testified (those with your wife and Mr. St. Clair)? If so, with whom? When? What was the substance of each conversation?

L. What did you mean when you told General Haig in an August 2nd telephone conversation that "nothing we had talked about the previous afternoon should be given any consideration in whatever decision the President might make?" What had you said the previous afternoon that could have been given consideration in any decision that President Nixon might make?

M. You testified that in that same telephone conversation with General Haig, you told him you "had no intention of recommending what President Nixon should do about resigning or not resigning." Did you give him your views on the desirability or lack of desirability of any of the six options? Did you tell General Haig in words or substance that if President Nixon exercised option No. 6, he could not count on your issuing a pardon?

N. Set forth everything else that was said in your August 2nd telephone conversation with Alexander Haig.

O. Aside from the conversations you testified to with Alexander Haig on the 1st and 2nd of August, did you or any member of your staff have any other conversations with Alexander Haig or at which Alexander Haig was present respecting a pardon for Richard Nixon, at any time before September 8, 1974? If so, please state the dates, persons present and the substance of each conversation.

P. Did you at any time prior to Mr. Nixon's resignation have any conversation with him respecting any pardons for himself or any of the Watergate defendants?

Q. From your testimony it is apparent that you had been advised, as early as August 1, 1974, that a pardon could legally be granted before indictment. Mr. Buchen, however, in his press conference of September 10, explained your August 28th statement—that you would not take any action "until legal process has been undertaken"—as stemming from your lack of awareness that a pardon could be granted before indictment. Since Mr. Buchen's explanation was wrong, what were the reasons for your August 28th statement? Why did you furnish this Subcommittee with copies of Mr. Buchen's incorrect explanation as "additional background information"? Why did you wait until after August 28th to ask your lawyers to explore the legalities further?

R. You testified that you received no reports "by people qualified to evaluate medically" Mr. Nixon's health. What, then, is the factual basis for your opinion that the prosecution and trial of Mr. Nixon would have "proved a serious threat to his health?"

SENATOR RANDOLPH OUTLINES ACTIVITIES OF THE SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE HANDICAPPED DURING THE 93D CONGRESS

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, as we review the work of the 93d Congress, I reaffirm the commitment of our Subcommittee on the Handicapped to the goal of equal rights for handicapped Americans. I am joined in this commitment by the members of the subcommittee, Senators ALAN CRANSTON of California; HARRISON A. WILLIAMS of New Jersey; CLAYBORNE PELL of Rhode Island; EDWARD KENNEDY of Massachusetts; WALTER MONDALE of Minnesota; WILLIAM HATHAWAY of Maine; ROBERT STAFFORD of Vermont; ROBERT TAFT of Ohio; RICHARD SCHWEIKER of Pennsylvania; and J. GLENN BEALL of Maryland. It is gratifying to outline results of activities of our subcommittee during the 93d Congress. It is appropriate at this time of the year to share with others our feeling of accomplishment.

To this end, during the 93d Congress, the subcommittee directly considered legislation on the following issues:

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

During the first session, as chairman of the subcommittee, it was my privilege to introduce two bills—S. 7 and S. 1875—to extend and improve the Vocational Rehabilitation Act. All members of the subcommittee participated in developing these proposals. S. 7 was vetoed by President Nixon, and the Senate failed to override the veto. Following intensive meetings of the subcommittee with administration officials, a compromise bill (S. 1875) was introduced which, along with H.R. 8070, was the basis of a final bill enacted into law as Public Law 93-112. This legislation provides priority for vocational rehabilitation services to those with the most severe handicaps, expands special Federal responsibilities, and establishes special responsibilities of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare for the coordination of all programs in the Department with respect to handicapped citizens.

During the second session, the staff of the subcommittee met many times with the staff of the Rehabilitation Services Administration to oversee the promulgation of the regulations developed pursuant to Public Law 93-112. The proposed regulations were published May 28, 1974; final regulations were published December 5, 1974. We made clear our intent to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare and the Department of Labor—which is writing the regulations for section 503 of Public Law 93-112—that the regulations must clearly and carefully carry out congressional intent in the implementation of the rehabilitation program.

The members of the subcommittee were not satisfied with the placement of the administration of the vocational rehabilitation program within the Social and Rehabilitation Service—an administrative unit which implements welfare programs. Senator STAFFORD of Vermont, ranking minority member of the subcommittee, introduced S. 3108, which moved the administration of the rehabilitation program out of SRS and into the Office of the Secretary. S. 3108 was cosponsored by all members of the subcommittee and amended in committee to extend the authorization of appropriations in the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 for 2 years—with the exception of the basic State grant services program which was extended for 1 year only; to make technical and clarifying amendments to provide more effective expressions of the original congressional intent and understandings underlying certain provisions in Public Law 93-112; to make various amendments to the Randolph-Sheppard Act by incorporating the provisions of S. 2581 as passed by the Senate; and to authorize the President to convene a White House Conference on Handicapped Individuals by incorporating with technical changes, the provisions of Senate Joint Resolution 118 as passed by the Senate. This legislation was vetoed by President Ford, but the veto was overridden in the Senate by 90 to 1 and in the House by 398 to 7.

The administration was unclear as to whether it could implement this program; the problem was whether or not the veto was a pocket veto. Therefore, to enable this important program to continue, the Senate passed a bill identical to H.R. 14225—originally S. 3108 in the Senate—which is now Public Law 93-516.

EDUCATION

During the first session, the Senate passed S. 896, the Education of the Handicapped Amendments of 1973, which I introduced, jointly by all of the members of our subcommittee. The purpose of S. 896 was to extend the provisions of the Education of the Handicapped Act (Public Law 91-230) for 3 years beginning July 1, 1973, to insure the continued targeting of funds and resources to handicapped individuals as well as continued program coordination. S. 896 further insured that the record of leadership and professionalism in the Bureau of Education for the Handicapped be maintained and that the Bureau itself remain a strong, identifiable, administrative organization within the U.S. Office of Education.

Because the House companion bill to S. 896 was made part of the Elementary and Secondary Education Amendments of 1974 in the House Education and Labor Committee, the Subcommittee took the text of S. 896 and made it title VI of S. 1539, the Senate Elementary and Secondary Education Amendments of 1974 legislation. Subsequently, this legislation was further amended on the floor by Senator MATHIAS. This amendment greatly increased the authorizations under part B (Aid to the States) in order that the States could meet the new congressional mandate set forth in this legislation to provide full educational opportunity for all handicapped children. Another provision of national significance was the inclusion of a requirement that each State set forth a detailed plan of the policies and procedures it will undertake in order to assure that all handicapped children residing within the State are identified, located, and evaluated, as well as to assure that the State has established a goal of providing full training and educational opportunities for all handicapped children together with a timetable for accomplishing this goal and a description of additional facilities, personnel, and services necessary through the State to meet such a goal.

The Elementary and Secondary Education Amendments of 1974 were signed into law as Public Law 93-380. The subcommittee is now in the process of performing its oversight functions with regard to the promulgation of regulations concerning title VI—the extension of the Education of the Handicapped Act—and the earmark of funds under titles I—funds for State-supported and State-operated institutions for handicapped persons—and title IV—innovative programs and career education.

RANDOLPH-SHEPPARD PROGRAM

The subcommittee held 3 days of hearings during the first session on S. 2581, a bill to amend the Randolph-Sheppard Act. More than 37 years after the enactment of the original measure, action was urgently needed to protect blind vendors and improve the program by an expansion of opportunities for meaningful employment of blind individuals. According to the Rehabilitation Services Administration, the number of licensed blind vendors could be doubled within 5 years if the proper conditions existed and if training limitations and the restraints of undue competition were lifted.

The staff of the subcommittee met several times with representatives of the American Postal Workers Union, which opposed major provisions in S. 2581. It was thought that a compromise agreement had been reached, and the committee then reported and the Senate passed this legislation. Because of continued union opposition, however, the legislation did not move in the House. Thus, the Senate attached as an amendment the text of S. 2581 to the extension of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 (S. 3108 and H.R. 14225) as title II of that legislation; it was accepted in conference and by both the House and Senate as part of the conference report on H.R. 14225. As stated before, President Ford vetoed this measure; but the veto was overridden. New legislation was introduced, passed, and sent to the President, and signed into law.

DEVELOPMENTAL DISABILITIES

year extension—to June 30, 1974—as part of an omnibus health bill because the Senate was awaiting the results of a General Accounting Office report evaluating the developmental disabilities program. The Senate received the report in January 1974, and wrote legislation (S. 3378) which was targeted at correcting the inequities in and improving the program. New approaches in our legislation include: the development of an outreach program of satellite centers by University-Affiliated Facilities; the establishment of a new, more cooperative relationship between the State Developmental Disabilities Councils, the administering State agency, and the University-Affiliated Facilities; the development of an evaluation model which the State may use in setting up individual State evaluation systems; the strengthening of the State Developmental Disabilities Councils and the National Advisory Council; the broadening of the definition of a developmental disability; and the placement of the Division of Developmental Disabilities in the Office of the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. S. 3378 also incorporated the provisions of S. 458, Senator JAVITS' bill of rights for the mentally retarded, as well as new language for alternative procedures and criteria which institutions and community facilities could meet in lieu of the criteria originally set forth in S. 458. S. 3378 passed the Senate on October 1.

I regret it was not possible to complete action on this important legislation during the year. It is our intention to make this the first order of business in the 94th Congress.

JAVITS-WAGNER-O'DAY

The subcommittee has considered two bills amending the Javits-Wagner-O'Day Act. During the first session, the Senate passed H.R. 1413—now Public Law 93-76—which increased the authorization for fiscal year 1974 for the Committee for Purchase of Products and Services of the Blind and Other Severely Handicapped. The original Wagner-O'Day Act, which authorizes this committee, had been amended in two major respects: first, the special priority for the blind in selling certain products to the Federal Government was extended to other handicapped persons; second, the category of contracts under the act was expanded to include services. The original cost estimates for operating the committee were set in law; thus, the authorizations were increased.

The second amendment, S. 2687, provided the authorization for fiscal year 1975, made technical amendments, and added a 15th member to the statutory committee's membership. The House agreed to the Senate amendments, and this legislation is now Public Law 93-358.

WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON HANDICAPPED INDIVIDUALS

On June 18, 1973, the Senate passed a resolution directing that a White House Conference on the Handicapped be called by the President. When the House did not act on this or similar legislation, the Senate attached the text of this resolution—with amendments—to H.R. 14225, the extension of the Rehabilitation Amendments of 1973. Again, President Ford vetoed this measure, but an identical bill is now Public Law 93-516. This provision authorizes the President to convene a White House Conference on Handicapped Individuals to develop recommendations for further action based on the assessment of national problems facing individuals with handicaps and solutions to these problems.

42206

EDUCATION FOR ALL HANDICAPPED CHILDREN ACT

The subcommittee held a series of hearings on S. 6, the Education for All Handicapped Children Act. Three days of hearings were held in Washington, and field hearings were held in Newark, N.J.; Columbia, S.C.; Boston, Mass.; Minneapolis-St. Paul, Minn.; and Harrisburg, Pa. This legislation would greatly amend part B of the Education of the Handicapped Act by requiring the States to educate all handicapped children—after identification, location, and evaluation—and by providing for a funding mechanism different from that in use in many States. This legislation, which would be far-reaching in its results, is still under consideration by the subcommittee as more information is being gathered.

The subcommittee has also been involved in legislation pending before other committees and over which it does not have jurisdiction, but which touches on the lives of handicapped citizens. It acted with the Senate Banking Committee on a bill amending the Small Business Act to insure that the interest rate of the Small Business Administration's share of loans to handicapped persons remained at the subsidized rate of 3 percent per annum. This bill is now Public Law 93-386. We have worked with the Senate Public Works Committee, which I have the privilege to chair, to insure that any mass transportation system receiving funds from the Federal Aid Highway Act be planned and designed to be accessible to all handicapped persons, including those in wheelchairs. Public Law 93-383, the Housing and Community Development Act of 1974, contains an amendment I advocated which directs the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development to take into account the needs of handicapped and elderly persons in administering housing programs and insure that mentally impaired persons may take advantage of the housing programs at HUD. Finally, efforts were continued to insure that handicapped citizens be given special consideration in any energy rationing system. I have introduced an amendment to the Standby Energy Authorities Act outlining specific steps which provide for the special needs of disabled persons in any fuel allocation program. In recent letters, this proposal has been outlined to President Ford, the Honorable Rogers C. B. Morton, Secretary of the Interior, and the Honorable Frank G. Zarb, Administrator of the Federal Energy Administration.

The Subcommittee on the Handicapped has also been active in issues which have not directly involved legislation, but which still touch the lives of handicapped citizens. At the urging of the subcommittee, the Architect of the Capitol has initiated work aimed at making all Federal buildings on Capitol Hill accessible to the physically disabled. A consultant to the Architect has been hired for this purpose, and work has been started.

With the support of the members of our subcommittee, we have been active in promoting the right of handicapped persons to air transportation. Unfortunately, many instances have recently come to light of mobility-impaired individuals being refused transportation by commercial air carriers on the grounds that a disabled person would pose a threat to the safety of flight should an emergency occur. I prepared a statement which was included in the record on the hearings sponsored by the Federal Aviation Administration concerning the promulgation of regulations on the air transportation of handicapped citizens. When the proposed regulations were published and found totally inadequate, we were joined by three members of the Special Committee on Aging in our protest to the Administrator of the FAA. The subcommittee is watching closely any further developments on this issue and is committed to the right of handicapped persons to air transportation.

Another activity has been a series of meetings with Mrs. Virginia Knauer, of the White House Office on Consumer Affairs, and her staff. The meetings were organized to resolve the issue of hearing aid users' inability to use the new Trimline telephone. Some constructive action has resulted from those meetings: for every bank of telephones there will be a phone which can be used by persons wearing a hearing aid and which will be identified as such. In addition, the telephone companies will continue to provide to hearing aid users the present model telephones which are compatible. I have corresponded with Lewis Engman of the Federal Trade Commission, and with Dean Burch of the Federal Communications Commission, indicating that my belief that these agencies have a responsibility to the consumer, that is, the hearing aid user, to help resolve not only the problem which the Trimline telephone presents, but also other telecommunications.

I have requested that the subcommittee work on several proposals regarding the possibility of serving the hearing-impaired through the activities supported by the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. It is my belief that since one of the most indispensable avenues of information for our society has been provided by technological advancement in telecommunications, we should explore possibilities for programing targeted toward handicapped individuals. There have been several meetings at the staff level to research and discuss these ideas.

We have worked to see that the intent of the Congress in matters affecting handicapped persons have not been ignored. On August 1, 1973, I submitted a resolution objecting to the administration's abolishing two statutory advisory committees which are necessary to the welfare of handicapped citizens: The National Advisory Committees on Education of the Deaf, and on Handicapped Children. In response to the submission of the resolution, HEW Under Secretary Carlucci contacted me and, following several discussions with the members of the subcommittee, it was agreed that HEW would not abolish the committees but create a new statutory committee combining the functions of the two advisory committees. The resolution was withdrawn after the subcommittee received assurances that the statutory base and the functions of these important committees would be continued.

The subcommittee also is deeply involved in oversight of regulations promulgated pursuant to enacted legislation. It is just beginning its oversight of regulations developed on title VI of Public Law 93-380—concerning education of handicapped children. However, for the entire second session of the 93d Congress, there have been many meetings with the staff of the Rehabilitation Services Administration, the Office of Civil Rights at the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and the Department of Labor on the regulations accompanying the Rehabilitation Act of 1973. I believe that the great amount of time spent on the regulations will ultimately benefit all handicapped citizens.

I must call your attention to the fact that the support of handicapped individuals and organizations serving handicapped persons has been invaluable in achieving the results from our joint efforts. While we note these endeavors, much remains to be done. With the continued cooperation of handicapped Americans and their organizations, our subcommittee will proceed in the 94th Congress toward our mutual goal of equal rights for everyone.

LES ARENDS

HON. JOHN W. WYDLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 18, 1974

Mr. WYDLER. Mr. Speaker, I will miss LES ARENDS. He has had a distinguished career here in the U.S. Congress and has played an important part in the history of our Nation. I, however, will always think of him as a good friend from whom I learned much.

His service as whip to the Republican Party was a service that benefited both the Congress and the Nation. He was truly the gentleman whip, and his services will be sorely missed by all.

TRIBUTE TO THE HONORABLE JOHN M. ZWACH

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ROONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, during my more than three decades here in this Chamber I have gotten to know, admire, and work with many fine and outstanding men from all over this great country of ours. Eleven of them I have known from the time I first arrived while most of the others were met later on in my career in this body. The man I praise today upon his retirement is the Honorable JOHN M. ZWACH of Minnesota. He is one of the distinguished Members I have gotten to know in the latter stages of my tenure here. JOHN was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in the 1966 elections after a long and distinguished career in State government in his home State of Minnesota. From 1937 to 1946 he served in the Minnesota House of Representatives and from 1946 until his election to this body 20 years later, in the Minnesota State Senate. From 1959 to 1966 he was the majority leader of the Minnesota Senate.

The people of his district in Minnesota obviously recognized his great talent and dedication to their service for they elected him to this body in the fall of 1966 and to each succeeding Congress.

Here in the House, JOHN has been known for his concern and hard work on the House Committees on Agriculture and on Veterans' Affairs. The American farmer and the American voter will have lost a good and trusted friend with the retirement of JOHN ZWACH.

Mrs. Rooney joins me in wishing JOHN, his fine wife and family many happy, healthy, and peaceful years to come.

CHET HOLIFIELD

HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a privilege and honor for me to rise and pay tribute to one of the greatest Congressmen of all time—the Honorable CHET HOLIFIELD of the great State of California. I remember CHET from the first day I came here in the 80th Congress. I recognized him as a leader and one from whom to seek counsel and guidance.

I was fortunate to be assigned to the Government Operations Committee which wrote the act unifying our armed services. In working out the details of that act, CHET HOLIFIELD was outstanding. CHET is largely responsible for the creation of a U.S. Air Force, the CIA, and here in Congress of the House and Senate Armed Services Committees. Because of CHET HOLIFIELD's foresight, America became stronger and I believe avoided world war III. America is stronger and the cause of freedom more secure because of the leadership of this great all-American statesman.

In the field of atomic energy, CHET has had no equal. He has spent days, weeks, months, and many years making this Nation No. 1 in the world in atomic energy. He has used atomic energy to preserve the peace of the world. Without his knowledge of this science and his dedication to U.S. strength in this field, I believe the world would have been destroyed in a nuclear holocaust.

Less spectacular perhaps, but just as important, has been his painstaking but sure success in developing the peaceful uses of atomic energy. The United States today leads the world in the generation of electricity from nuclear energy. This has been a fantastic and often unrecognized accomplishment. With the present fuel crises it would have been a national disaster had we not gone ahead with the nuclear generation of electricity. CHET HOLIFIELD deserves every honor for his courageous fight to move this program along over misguided but fanatic opposition. CHET HOLIFIELD is recognized and appreciated the world over for his leadership in the field of atomic energy. He has participated in world conferences as adviser and consultant. He is respected and admired by world leaders, both political and scientific.

As a committee chairman and Joint Committee chairman, he is superior in every respect. He is always polite, gentlemanly, and dignified. He has courage tempered with knowledge and understanding. This is a better Congress, ours is a better Nation and the world is better because of the dedication and devotion of this great and good man. I value and cherish his personal friendship and wise counsel over the years.

CHET has been fortunate in having by his side over the years one of the most devoted and lovely wives in the history of Congress. Mrs. Holifield is a truly great lady who understands and loves the political world. They have 4 charming daughters, 15 grandchildren, and 2 great-grandchildren. CHET HOLIFIELD's service to country and his wonderful family are an example to be emulated for the youth of today. I wish for my dear friend and his lovely family much happiness and continued success. Mrs. Dorn joins me in love and best wishes to them always.

TRIBUTE TO GENE AINSWORTH, SPECIAL ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT

HON. JAMIE L. WHITTEN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, December 18, 1974

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, my friend, Congressman BOB MICHEL, has called to our attention the fact that our good friend, Gene Ainsworth, is resigning his position at the White House as a representative for the President. I know the President will miss him and will personally suffer a real loss; however, Gene wishes to enter private business and in this venture, we certainly wish him the greatest success.

Not only does he carry with him a wonderful experience here where he has shown outstanding ability at a very difficult time, but he took on what is probably the hardest job in the world and handled it well. He handled it with integrity, ability, and again with that pleasing smile he has.

He has served in an area which we all know has been very controversial, with the press and the Congress, and yet he handled his problems in a way which was a credit to himself and his home State, Mississippi.

Those of us who know him are not surprised with his decision. We shall miss him in the position he has filled so ably. We can only say that now we wish for him and his family the greatest success as he tries his hand in the business world, and too, many years of happiness.

FRANK ALBERT STUBBLEFIELD

HON. O. C. FISHER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take this opportunity to commend my good friend, FRANK STUBBLEFIELD, who will retire from Congress at the end of 1974. FRANK has made a truly distinguished record while serving in the House. I believe it is fair to say he has as many or more friends as any other one Member of this body. He is universally admired and respected.

FRANK STUBBLEFIELD is a true patriot. He gives strong support to worthy legislation and always votes in a way that helps to protect our hard-pressed taxpayers. He is economy-minded, supports national defense, and has been one of the most valuable Members who has served in the House for many years.

In his retirement, I extend to FRANK and his family my very best wishes in his future endeavors.

THE AREA AGENCY ON AGING CONCEPT

HON. J. GLENN BEALL, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, on November 13, 1974, the Labor and Public Welfare Committee's Subcommittee on Aging held hearings in Salisbury, Md. These hearings were preparatory to legislation we will be considering early in the 94th Congress that will extend and strengthen the Older American Act of 1965.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my opening statement be printed in the Record at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

OPENING STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE J. GLENN BEALL, JR.

As the Ranking Minority Member on the Labor and Public Welfare Committee's Subcommittee on Aging, it is my pleasure to chair today's hearing which is designed to examine, in depth, the Area Agency on Aging Concept which is embodied in the Older Americans Act of 1965, as amended.

I am especially pleased that the Subcommittee has agreed to convene in Salisbury, the site of one of the early demonstration projects developed to test the feasibility of the area wide approach to service delivery.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

December 20, 1974

Since the first White House Conference on Aging was held in 1961, the Federal Government has gradually increased its commitment to the objective of improving the quality of life for older Americans. State and local governments have also shown a greater concern for the problems of the elderly.

On May 4, 1973, the President signed into law the Older Americans Comprehensive Services Amendments which significantly increase the federal commitment in the field of aging. Public Law 93-29 is the basis for federal law designed to provide social and nutritional services to senior citizens. Since this legislation expires on June 30, 1975, it is imperative that the Subcommittee on Aging begin immediately the task of compiling the data it needs to shape the 1975 amendments to the Older Americans Act, and that is why we are here in Salisbury today.

Public Law 93-29, constitutes a major departure from the preceding approach to state and community programs on aging. Under this legislation the Administration on Aging is actively encouraging state and local aging agencies to develop a coordinated system of service delivery. The objective of this approach is to improve the delivery of services to senior citizens, make other federal, state, local and private resources available to senior citizens, and maximize efforts to avoid the premature institutionalization of older persons.

Under the provisions of Title III, most of the states are called upon to establish Area Agencies on Aging. The Area Agencies must establish a comprehensive and coordinated system for the delivery of social services within the area they encompass. In addition, the Area Agency on Aging is required to maintain an information and referral system which will help to bring together senior citizens and the existing services in each community.

The Maintenance of the Aged in the Community Project, (M.A.C.), which was founded in 1972 as an area-wide model project, is of special interest to the Subcommittee because it has been in existence for such a relatively long period of time. Most of the Area Agencies on Aging have been funded within the last year and it is extremely difficult for the Congress to adequately evaluate the validity of a concept whose implementation is so recent. The initial success of the area-wide model projects, such as M.A.C., helped to shape Title III of the Older Americans Comprehensive Services Act of 1973. The information we obtain today will make a significant contribution to shaping the legislation which will be pending before the 94th Congress early next year. We have designed today's hearing so as to place maximum attention on the way the Area Agency on Aging concept is operating on the four lower eastern shore counties, of Maryland. Our witnesses today will give us a perspective of the Maintenance of the Aged in the Community Project from the federal level, the state level, the county level, as well as the views of those who participate in its various programs.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, I believe that my opening statement outlines the subcommittee's objectives in going to Salisbury to examine, in depth, the maintenance of the aged in the community project—MAC. Because of the importance of the Older Americans Act and the programs it establishes, I wish to present a summary of the testimony each of the witnesses gave during this hearing. Each witness provided a somewhat different point of view and I thought it would be of interest to my colleagues to have a summary of this material.

Mr. President, I, therefore, ask that the agenda be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the agenda was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, a summary of the testimony presented to the Subcommittee on Aging, Labor, and Public Welfare, in Salisbury, Md., on November 13, 1974, is as follows:

SUMMARY OF TESTIMONY

(By John A. Price, Program Director on Aging, Region III, Administration on Aging, Office of Human Development, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare)

The Regional Program Director on Aging for Region III is responsible for aging services authorized under the Older Americans Act in the Middle Atlantic States, including Maryland. The State of Maryland's application for an Area-Wide Model Project for Wicomico, Dorchester, Worcester, and Somerset was approved on December 23, 1971 to begin February 1, 1972. It has been supported out of area-wide model funds, or model funds, in the amount of $26,000 planning grant from February to June 1972. The first operational year grant was $261,000 for 1972-73. The second operational grant was $281,500; and the third year was $112,000, for a total of $681,533 Federal dollars. During the third year the MAC Project is being phased into this State aging agency strategy.

The MAC Area-Wide Model Project was designed to help senior citizens overcome either direct or indirect barriers which might otherwise prevent them from living independently in the community and to enable them to participate in a full and meaningful way in the life of their community.

The 1973 amendments to the Older Americans Act incorporated the area wide strategy into the overall state plan and those projects which were started under the Area-Wide Model Program authorized in the 1969 amendments were expected to be phased into the state strategy in 1974. Eleven issues have evolved in the implementation of these area agencies during the past year which have also affected the transition of the MAC Project into the Maryland Area Agency Strategy. These issues are as follows:

One. To what extent do the requirements for the Area Agency on Aging exceed their capacity?

There are fourteen functions and responsibilities described in the model regulations for state and area planning. Many area agencies have two or three full-time employees; some report that they are overwhelmed by these requirements, especially in light of their resources.

Two. To what extent do area agencies need more latitude to provide direct services?

The experience expressed by many area agencies is that—the dearth of public and private agencies that are capable and willing to provide needed services to older Americans.

To what extent has the multi-county concept added an administrative layer which doesn't have direct access to local revenue? County Commissioners in most counties in the State of Pennsylvania want an Office of Aging in their counties.

Four. Under what circumstances should an area agency contract out its planning?

Five. How much authority does the state need to effectively implement the Title III program at the—at some state levels?

Some state area agencies are reporting that state policies are too restrictive, while other area agencies are reporting that the state policies are inadequate.

Six. What happens to the state responsibility, authority and role when local planning and program decisions are decentralized to area agencies?

Seven. Should a state be allowed to develop the capacity for statewide information referral sources for planning and service areas, or should it be totally the responsibility and authority of the area agency?

Eight. What is the responsibility and authority of the area agency for the nutrition programs in Title VII of the Older Americans Act?

Nine. To what extent should the area agency plan for services under Title VI of the Social Security Act, for Adult Social Services, as it is called?

Ten. To what extent can Title III funds be used to generate other services in poor and rural areas where there are weak or non-existent service agencies?

Eleven. How long should direct services be supported?

The Older Americans Act of 1965 limited Title III projects to three years. It was discovered by 1969 that few communities had the capacity to fully support the services that had been initiated.

TESTIMONY

(By Harry F. Walker, Executive Director, Maryland Commission on Aging)

During the first two years of the MAC Project, this program was funded at a ratio of 75% federal funds and 25% non-federal funds. It was administered by the State Commission on Aging with a project director at the state level assisted by local staff and a local advisory body made up of representatives of the County Commission on Aging, county governments, and other interested service organizations, etc.

December 20, 1974

During the second year of this project the Older Americans Act Amendments of 1973 called for the termination of the Area-Wide Model Project and the establishment of an Area Agency on Aging Concept in its place. One of the immediate problems affecting the MAC Program was that Federal funds can no longer come directly into the state as a discretionary grant for this Area-Wide Model Project. Thus the state has the option of either reducing services or providing an additional share of its Title III funds to continue the program. In order not to reduce services, the Maryland Commission on Aging earmarks sufficient funds out of the special grants for model projects to supplement the allocation that would have gone to the four counties of the lower shore as their share of the Title III money. It is our intention to do everything possible to enable the MAC project to continue at its current level of operation, despite the change in federal strategy from a 5 year federal program that is funded directly from Washington to the Area Agency on Aging Concept. What this change means is that the State must now divide the money that it has among all the area agencies on the basis of the number of elderly people in that area.

I think that the area agencies can be effective and useful in providing local coordination, pooling of local resources, providing local planning, and subcontracting for services with local agencies. However, it is possible that this may be done as well and perhaps better in certain instances by the state agency creating the local advisory body and supervising the planning at the local level. Under the present federal regulations, the state does not have this option but is instead required to create sub-state planning units covering all older people.

As Congress studies the effectiveness of area agencies in preparation for the enactment of the Older Americans Amendments in 1975, it should give consideration to whether or not the states should be given an additional flexibility and options in the provisions of services to senior citizens. It might be desirable to follow the pattern established in the Area-Wide Model Project of having a state person supervising the overall program supported with local staff and local planning personnel.

TESTIMONY

(By Joan Tadeo, Title III Coordinator, Maryland Commission on Aging)

The program goals of the MAC Area-Wide Model Project were to provide alternative services to avoid unnecessary institutional care to at-risk elders, age 60 and over, to insure independence within the community, and to bring about a comprehensive system of care for older adults thus alleviating isolation and dependency as much as possible.

Ms. Tadeo outlined in considerable detail the steps which were taken to plan and implement the MAC Project. Existing services such as the Geriatric Evaluation Service, Meals on Wheels, Adult Education, and so forth were expanded so as to better meet the needs of the at-risk elderly on the Lower Eastern Shore. Special training programs were established in order to provide the necessary trained personnel to administer and coordinate services for the elderly.

The Model Project also sought to identify and alleviate health care and nutritional needs of the at-risk population. Follow-up services were provided so as to insure that the needed services were actually received by the elderly.

TESTIMONY

(By Joseph P. Eberly, Executive Director, Maintenance of the Aged in the Community Project, Inc.)

MAC is a private, non-profit corporation recently formed and recognized by the Maryland Commission on Aging as the official Area Agency on Aging on the Lower Eastern Shore. MAC is responsible for the planning, coordination, and pooling of resources as well as the development of new services needed to support the elderly in their homes and communities. In addition, MAC is presently seeking to identify and assist the elderly population that is most in jeopardy of having to leave their homes for a life in an institution. We find that the majority of elderly here, and I am sure elsewhere, are fiercely independent and have struggled long and hard to maintain themselves in their own homes, however humble. Many of the elderly poor have demonstrated that they would prefer to remain in their frontier-style homes with wood burning stoves and perhaps an outside toilet to being sent to a brand new nursing home or a geriatric ward in the state hospital.

So as to provide the Subcommittee with an in depth review of the activities of the MAC Project, Mr. Eberly called upon each of the four Professional Staff Members who accompanied him on his panel to testify about their area of specialization.

TESTIMONY

(By Ms. Jean R. Monroe, Director, Multi-Service Senior Citizen Center)

There is a Multi-Service Senior Citizen Center in each of the four counties encompassing the MAC Project. Each center provides information and referral services, outreach services, transportation services and socialization. Each center is backed up by two or three satellite centers in outlying areas. These satellite centers also participate in the Title VII Nutrition Program as well as providing the services listed above.

The center staff consists of a director, outreach workers, a satellite coordinator, senior aides, a part time meal hostess, a secretary, and numerous community volunteers. Each center has two minibuses which are used in the outreach effort. The center operates five days a week with the various satellite centers operating from one to three days a week. The average daily attendance at the center and the satellite centers is between 30 and 40 people.

Each center provides a variety of social activities for the participants as well as providing necessary nutritional and social services.

A constant outreach effort is maintained in order to locate and help the at-risk elderly.

Because of the ruralness of the Lower Eastern Shore region, special emphasis is placed on transportation services. It was noted that this is one of the special needs in this area and one which needs expanding.

TESTIMONY

(By Mrs. Helen L. Johnson, Nutrition Coordinator, Title VII Program)

The Title VII project officially began on the lower shore on October of 1973. Prior to that some nutritional services were provided through the Title III funds. The program serves one hot meal each day, five days a week. In 1973 Worcester, Somerset, and Wicomico counties together served only 75 meals each day. At the present time between 250 and 300 meals are served each day in these three counties. An additional 60 meals are served each day in Dorchester County. There are 14 meal sites in the four counties covered by the MAC Project. 90% of the meals are consumed in congregate sites and the remaining 10% are delivered to homebound at-risk senior citizens.

TESTIMONY

The average cost per meal is $1.25. The meals are designed by a dietitian which insures that they are nutritionally well-balanced and adhere to the guidelines regulating the Title VII Program.

TESTIMONY

Although no specific charge is asked of the senior citizens who participate in this program, approximately 95% of the participants do contribute about 25c per meal. The income from these donations is used to continue and expand the program.

Many individuals volunteer their time to this program and local industries have donated soup, milk, bread, and other food items on a regular basis.

The Title VII Nutrition Program relies heavily upon the support services provided by Title III. Outreach, information and referral, shopping, counseling, recreation, and transportation services are all provided by the Title III Program. Without the support of Title III, the Title VII Nutrition Program would not be able to provide one half of the services that are currently being given.

TESTIMONY

(By Ms. Jean C. Crockett, R.N., Director, Homemakers/Home Health Care Program)

Homemakers/Home Health Services provide families with the ability to remain together in their own homes when health or social problems occur. In some cases an individual is able to return to his or her home after specialized care in either an acute or long-term care facilities. The main objective of the home care coordinator is to prevent unnecessary institutionalization and to assist institutionalized persons to return to their home and community if possible.

To achieve this objective the Home Health Care Program draws upon the resources of the Department of Social Services, the Social Security Administration, the local Health Department, and any other health related community resources. The home care coordinator develops a program of health care to meet the needs of each individual recipient. Every effort is made to utilize all existing community services and to maximize the quality of care.

Specialized training is provided for home-health aides, the staff of the senior citizen centers, and the families of the elderly ill.

During the current fiscal year the Home-maker/Home Health aides are serving 46 elderly patients for a total of 649 visits. The total cost per hour is projected to be $4.58. This lies well within the limits of the National League of Nursing and the National Council of Homemakers-Home Health Aide Services. This is far less costly than inpatient care received in nursing homes or state hospitals. The care is more personalized at the place of residence and it actively involves the entire family. The patient benefits by being allowed to continue his or her right role as a member of the family and the community.

TESTIMONY

(By Ms. Octavane H. Saunders, Nutrition Aide, University of Maryland Cooperative Extension Service)

One of the main objectives of the Cooperative Extension Service in the University of Maryland is to provide nutrition education for senior citizens. This is done, not because they do not have the expertise or experience in food preparation or food shopping, but because a senior citizen, living alone, does not always realize the importance of proper nutrition. Many at-risk senior citizens are also reluctant to participate in the Title VII and/or Food Stamp Programs.

Emphasis was placed on the need to strengthen the coordinating authority so as to insure a better pooling of resources for the benefit of needy senior citizens. This would include more closely integrating the Title VII Nutrition Program with the Title III Community Services Programs so as to make more efficient delivery of both nutritional and social services.

The need for stabilizing the availability of federal program funds was stressed so as to allow the project to concentrate its efforts on implementing programs rather than worrying about locating funds on a year to year basis.

The average nutrition aide carries a case load of not less than 50 families. When a family no longer needs the assistance of the nutrition aide, the aides moves on to other cases.

The University of Maryland provides the necessary training for the nutrition aide including periodic inservice training to keep the staff abreast of current developments in the field.

As with the other senior citizen programs, volunteers assist the nutrition aides in the delivery of this important service.

TESTIMONY

(By Joseph P. Eberly)

In his conclusion, Mr. Eberly the Executive Director of the MAC Project advised the Committee of the current budget situation confronting this program. To ease the transition from Area Wide Model Project to Area Agency on Aging, the State Director on Aging has submitted a budget proposal that would provide $200,000 to the MAC Project in Fiscal Year 1976. Under the current Title III Area Agency formula approximately $390,000 of federal funds would flow into the project. Even with the $200,000 state grant the MAC Program will probably have to curtail some of its existing services. If the additional State funds are not made available the out-reach and transportation services would be severely restricted and the program would necessarily retreat into the main centers. The principal remaining service would then be the Title VII Nutrition Program.

SECOND PANEL—LOCAL GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS

Hon. Helen S. Ward, Commissioner-elect, Somerset County—Mrs. Ward commented briefly on her services as a MAC volunteer and expressed her desire to see that this program continues to receive high priority on the Federal, state, and local levels.

Hon. Philip G. D'Adamo, Board of County Commissioners, Dorchester County—From the point of view of a local elected official, one of the problems in any of the programs such as this is the stability of federal funding. Changes in formula, levels of appropriation, etc. often caused the federal support to erode leaving the county holding the bag with the decision to either continue the funding or else drop the program.

In addition, county governments are confronted with a tremendous amount of paper work in a federal program such as this. The forms could be streamlined so as to expedite their processing.

Hon. Willis W. Hudson, Board of County Commissioners, Worcester County—Commissioner Hudson commented on the usefulness of having congressional field hearings so that federal, state and local officials can derive a benefit from them.

The MAC Project has been received with great enthusiasm by the people in Worcester County and the local government, in cooperation with the federal government, will seek to do everything it can to maintain the existing level of services. Special emphasis was placed on the need for additional transportation services in rural areas.

Hon. Lewis R. Riley, President, Wilcomico County Council—Emphasis was placed on the limited resources available to local general purpose governments. Thus programs such as this must rely heavily upon federal revenue resources. Since the MAC Project was established the wrinkles have been ironed out in the working relationship between the county governments and the regional program. Now, however, the county governments are somewhat disturbed by the possibility of a significant reduction in federal support for this project. Since the operating problems have been resolved now is the time to continue federal funding rather than reducing it.

Councilman Riley also proposed greater flexibility for the local governments to utilize federal funding. This would allow the programs to reflect the needs of each specific area.

In conclusion, each of the four local officials expressed their support for a continuation of revenue sharing as well as federal funding for the MAC Program.

PANEL OF SENIOR CITIZENS

A number of senior citizens who participate in the various aspects of the MAC Project testified before the Subcommittee. Each addressed themselves to how the specific MAC Programs have affected them.

Ms. Viola Comegys from Cambridge discussed the various activities of the Multi-Service Senior Citizen Center in Dorchester County and the important role it has played in her life since her retirement.

Ms. Inez Abbott from south Dorchester County joined the senior citizen center following a severe personal tragedy. As a result of various activities at the center, Ms. Abbott has become very active in her community once again and now serves as a senior aide.

Mrs. Viola McClain of Cambridge discussed the transportation services provided by the Senior Citizen Center in Dorchester County.

Mrs. Myrtle Bowen of Snow Hill described the field trips and other social activities conducted by the Worcester County Senior Citizen Center.

Mrs. Lenora Robins of Snow Hill described how the Homemaker/Home Health Care Program has helped her care for her husband who is suffering from diabetes and 2 strokes.

Mrs. Irene Holland of Fairmount discussed the activities of the Somerset County Senior Citizen Center and commented favorably on the racial harmony that exists among the senior citizens who participate in this program.

Mrs. Ella Dedmond of Princess Anne described how the Somerset County MAC Center helped her resume an active life following the death of her husband in 1972.

Ms. Bessie Miles from Salisbury discussed the social activities of the Wilcomico Senior Citizen Center and some of the additional projects, such as gardening, carpentry, etc., which they have undertaken.

Mr. Lorenzo Marshall of Salisbury discussed how many of the senior citizens who are able to drive organize carpools to help bring others to the center where they can participate in the various activities.

Mr. John B. Griffin discussed the activities of the FISH Volunteer Organization which seeks to assist senior citizens on the Lower Eastern Shore.

Mrs. Bernice Dougherty of Crisfield described the benefits she had received from a senior aide connected with the MAC Project.

Mr. Walter Brice of Crisfield described various activities of the MAC Center in Somerset County.

Alberta Graves described the general fellowship and good feeling that exists among the participants in the Somerset County Senior Citizen Center.

Mr. ROONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, during this past summer when my good and long time respected friend from Buffalo the Honorable THADDEUS J. DULSKI announced his retirement, it was my pleasure to insert in the RECORD of August 30, 1974, some remarks that were wholly sincere and true. If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like to expand on those remarks at this time.

It is only fair to say that the distinguished gentleman who will succeed Ted DULSKI will find a very large pair of boots to fill. The achievements of Ted DULSKI are difficult to measure for they cannot be gaged by the simple and expedient method of counting the number of bills he passed or votes he cast. His real worth was his honesty and integrity and his genuine care for the people of New York's 37th Congressional District and their needs. That is the finest legacy a Representative in the U.S. Congress can leave.

Mrs. Rooney joins me in wishing Ted DULSKI, his lovely wife and his fine family Godspeed on his well-earned retirement.

HON. CRAIG HOSMER

HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to pay tribute to one of the most dedicated and knowledgeable Members of the Congress, Hon. CRAIG HOSMER. Long before the present energy crisis gripped the Nation CRAIG HOSMER was leading the fight for long-range development of our energy resources. He is one of the Nation's leading experts on nuclear energy policy, and a real pioneer in the field. CRAIG HOSMER served the Nation with great distinction during active naval service in World War II; our country has continued to benefit from his keen understanding of national security matters.

Mr. Speaker, CRAIG HOSMER is leaving the Congress, but I am hopeful that he will remain active in public service. During this time of crisis in our energy situation we need his wise counsel more than ever.

CONGRESSWOMAN EDITH GREEN

HON. PATSY T. MINK

OF HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mrs. MINK. Mr. Speaker, I want to add my warm Aloha and best wishes to our colleague EDITH GREEN as she takes leave of the Congress after a long distinguished career of service to her constituents and to the country as a whole.

Her contribution toward equality for women in education and in the workaday world came long before the movement for equality gained popular momentum.

EDITH is certainly one of the most respected and highly regarded Members of the House, and her presence will be missed. I certainly join with all her many friends and longtime associates in wishing her the very best of happiness and good health in her retirement years.

December 20, 1974

J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT'S SENATE CAREER COVERED NOTABLE ACHIEVEMENTS

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, the close of the 93d Congress marked the end of one of the most illustrious careers in the history of the U.S. Senate. Senator J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT of Arkansas is best known for his activities to promote and protect world peace as former chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. His prominence in this field overshadowed his service on behalf of the education, health, and welfare of our Nation's citizens.

It is not generally known that the Senator from Arkansas was one of the early proponents of Federal aid to education. The legislation that is most closely associated with Senator FULBRIGHT is the international educational exchange program which came to bear his name—the Fulbright Scholarships, which I voted for as a House Member in 1946. Over the past two decades, more than 140,000 persons from several countries have participated. The cost has been a relatively small amount for one of the most successful efforts to improve international understanding.

As a member of the Senate Subcommittee on Education, I can attest that Senator FULBRIGHT's support for education has been strong and continuous. He was a sponsor of the landmark Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, the National Defense Education Act, the school lunch program, and the 1972 Comprehensive Child Development Act. He also was a supporter of occupational, vocational, and adult education programs, and many other education bills.

The sense of loss at the departure of Senator FULBRIGHT should be accompanied by a sense of challenge. He has served this country well as one of its foremost spokesmen over the past 30 years in Congress. It is our responsibility to accept the challenge he fostered of advancing the interests of world peace and domestic well-being. Mary and I wish the best of good living to BILL and ELIZABETH and their family in the years ahead.

EXPLANATION OF VOTE

HON. FRANK ANNUNZIO

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I was recorded as not voting on December 20 on roll No. 727 on the conference report on H.R. 620 to establish within the Department of the Interior an additional Assistant Secretary of the Interior for Indian Affairs. I was present and did vote "aye"—and apparently, the recording machine did not record my vote. I want the RECORD to show my position and my vote on the conference report on H.R. 620, which was an "aye" vote.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

AFTER 32 YEARS

HON. O. C. FISHER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, the 93d Congress has adjourned. More than a year ago I announced my retirement at the end of this year, completing a total of three decades and 2 years in the Congress.

This has been an historic period. Three wars have been fought; much tragedy has been suffered; seven different Presidents have occupied the White House; we have witnessed moon landings; television and jet propelled aircraft have appeared; and many other magnificent scientific and technological breakthroughs have occurred.

Perhaps this is a good time to briefly review some of the highlights of the various administrations. This calls for objectivity, the laying aside of partisanship and emotionalism.

SEVEN PRESIDENTS

Franklin D. Roosevelt was in the White House when I was sworn in back in 1943. The war was then at its peak, and I think history recognized FDR as a wartime President who performed well in rallying the American people behind the war effort and in his relationship with Winston Churchill and other allied heads of state. He provided strong wartime leadership.

On the domestic front history records some question marks, although during the depression Roosevelt did impose some wise and necessary emergency measures. Elected on a balance-the-budget platform, he lost no time in scrapping that design and proceeded to inaugurate a number of new programs, many of them unrelated to relief for the unemployed.

Favored by a rubber stamp Congress, FDR pushed through pet measures drafted by braintrusts at the White House, including the National Recovery Act—NRA—which the Supreme Court held unconstitutional. That triggered the abortive attempt to pack the Supreme Court by adding more members to that tribunal. The Senate blocked that effort, but vacancies soon occurred which were filled by vocal and dedicated New Dealers.

That marked the first undisguised move by a President to choose judges who would be disposed to place philosophical commitments ahead of constitutional mandates.

While the Roosevelt years produced some worthwhile legislative enactments, it also witnessed the surfacing of the socialist-minded and the liberals, many of whom were taken into the Government and left their marks. In a way, it inaugurated a new era, some changes in the American way of life; tampered with the free enterprise system, and played havoc with some cherished American traditions.

As a politician, FDR capitalized on the depression to court favor with America's blacks. With Eleanor's help, vast numbers of Negroes were enticed to leave the Republican Party, the party of Lincoln and emancipation, and most of them have been aboard the Democratic bandwagon ever since.

HOOVER, A PATRIOT

Incidentally, speaking of the depression, I think history confirms the fact that Herbert Hoover had absolutely nothing to do with bringing on the depression in the 1930's, although he got much blame for it. The depression was worldwide and would have occurred regardless of who was in the White House. Hoover was a man of great compassion. As a patriot and statesman he was preeminent.

Few people know that President Hoover never accepted pay for his services while in the White House. His monthly checks were all returned to the Treasury.

FDR AND STALIN

I recall the last time I ever saw President Roosevelt. It was on March 1, 1945, when he addressed a joint session of the Congress to report on the Yalta conference. He sat in a wheel chair and was obviously a sick man.

The American press had been critical about some reported concessions at Yalta, and FDR gave his personal assurance that we could trust Stalin and that all was well. Among other things, Stalin had given assurance there would be post-war free elections in all the Russian-occupied Balkan States—elections that have not yet been held, 30 years later.

Six weeks following his last appearance in Congress, Roosevelt was dead.

HARRY TRUMAN

Then came Harry Truman of Missouri, a product of the Pendergast machine, who gained prominence as a Senator and Vice President, and possessed many admirable qualities.

I would say, from my viewpoint, Truman will rate fairly high in history, due largely to three or four major historic actions. He ended World War II by ordering use of the atomic bomb, after first calling in vain for Japanese surrender. He provided aid for the Greeks against Yugoslav-based guerrillas; he approved the Marshall Plan, and he ordered the Russians to keep their word and get their troops out of Iran, which they proceeded to do.

Like Roosevelt, on the domestic front Truman, in my judgment, left much to be desired. Like Roosevelt, he was unduly beholden to labor leaders, vetoed the Taft-Hartley Act and the Hobbs Act at the behest of Bill Green and Phil Murray, and virtually allowed Murray to dictate the terms of his veto of a tax bill, which inspired an impassioned Senate speech by Senator Barkley.

Near the end of his regime Truman was so pro-labor that he stubbornly refused to invoke the Taft-Hartley Act to stop a devastating long-drawn-out steel strike that brought the Nation to its knees. Finally, when the situation became intolerable and his hand was forced, instead of invoking the law Truman ordered the Government to take over the steel plants—an unprecedented action which was promptly held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

To his credit, however, when a nationwide railroad strike was imminent, Truman asked Congress to put all railroad workers in the Army, to be subject to courts martial and under his control as Commander in Chief. The request was promptly approved by the House, and the strike was then called off before the Senate could act.

DWIGHT EISENHOWER

Then came Dwight Eisenhower, a national hero, who for 8 years served the Nation well. He was not a crusader, and he came along at a time when Americans were ready for some tranquility at the White House. They were weary of New Deals and Fair Deals. He soon brought the Korean war to an end, and he bolstered our moves against Communist threats, both at home and abroad.

Ike was economy minded, and although spending was high the budget was balanced on at least two occasions, as I recall, during his tenure. He followed policies of good will and conciliation, rather than force and compulsion, in coping with racial and labor problems.

Two unfortunate mistakes made by Eisenhower, which he later regretted, was a veto of a natural gas bill and the appointment of Earl Warren to be Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

Of the Presidents who preceded Gerald Ford, Eisenhower was the only one, with the exception of Nixon, who did not kowtow to labor leaders. He treated them fairly, but he was tough and forthright when the occasion required it. For example, on the night before the Landrum-Griffin Act was voted upon and approved in the House, Ike went on a national TV hookup to urge support of the legislation to deal with secondary boycotts and other needed reforms. The unions, with no valid reason, fought that bill bitterly, but the President took the issue to the American people, and he got the job done.

Texas, of course, will never forget the debt they owe Eisenhower for signing the bill which confirmed title to their tidelands, which was in accord with the terms of the admission of Texas to the Union—legislation which during the preceding campaign Adlai Stevenson had promised if elected he would veto.

Incidentally, it was my honor and privilege to be named by the Speaker as one of the two Members to represent the House of Representatives at the Eisenhower funeral at Abilene, Kan.

JOHN KENNEDY

The Kennedy New Frontier days were too brief for us to form very much of an appraisal. Had he listened more to his father Joe and less to his brother Bobby, I personally think John Kennedy would have been much better off.

In terms of history Kennedy faltered, I think, by refusing to provide essential air support for the Bay of Pigs operation, after the CIA, with administration knowledge, had helped plan and direct the attempted invasion of Cuba. Had there been air support at the critical time, military experts believe the Castro regime would have fallen, the Monroe Doctrine would have been upheld, and there would have been a different ball game.

As is well known, Kennedy was extremely pro-labor, pro-minority blocs, pro-liberal, and was socialistically oriented. He was a crusader and, whether intended or not, his policies fomented a great deal of racial unrest throughout the country.

LYNDON B. JOHNSON

It is too early for a proper perspective to evaluate the Lyndon Johnson record. He was a dynamic leader, often described as a wheeler-dealer who had a habit of counting the total number of bills enacted each year as an indicator of the success of his administration.

In the name of Great Society he initiated many antipoverty and an array of multibillion-dollar social measures, the mounting costs of which, since that time, have burdened the annual budgets. That can be good, or otherwise—depending on the way you look at it. Personally, I took a dim view of most of the budget-busting Great Society ventures and voted against them. Maybe that makes me an old fogey, but that was the way I saw it then—and still see it.

Although hampered by unfortunate miscalculations in military strategy, such as giving sanctuary status to the enemy's big port of Haiphong and the Hanoi area, Lyndon Johnson is entitled to much credit for his determination to defeat the Communists in the south and bring peace to Southeast Asia. For this patriotic move, he was mercilessly vilified by pro-Communists at home and, of course, by the Communist warlords in Hanoi.

A multitude of civil rights and welfare measures, some of them ill considered and counterproductive, sailed through the Congress, particularly the notorious rubberstamp 89th Congress, with L. B. J. pressing the movement.

Johnson's tenure in the White House was plagued by antiwar demonstrations, campus revolts, and a succession of Negro riots which struck in California at Watts, in New Jersey, in Detroit, in Washington, and elsewhere, with total property damage exceeding $1 billion.

These outbreaks cannot be charged to the White House, but some of the emotional outbursts are traceable to excessive civil rights legislation, and the accompanying agitation and utopian promises from political opportunists and radical leaders in the crusade. The Congress must share a major part of any guilt associated with that legislation.

RICHARD NIXON

Following Johnson came Richard Nixon. If we can lay aside the tragedy of Watergate for a moment, we can better appraise the overall Nixon record.

History will record that Nixon's courageous and timely policies brought the Vietnam war to a halt, obtained release of prisoners of war, and brought 500,000 American troops home.

I thought Nixon performed right well in helping bring the October 1973 Middle East conflict to an end, with some hope for a permanent settlement. And, not to be overlooked, was his four appointments to fill vacancies on the Supreme Court, which changed the complexion of that previously discredited tribunal. For this, history will undoubtedly give Nixon some high marks.

Only the future can appraise the dialog Nixon established with the Chinese and the Soviets. It was, in any event, a breakthrough which was widely acclaimed throughout the Western World.

GERALD FORD

It is, of course, far too early to make a responsible judgment about the present incumbent, Gerald Ford. His attitude on many issues and his general philosophy were well established during his 25 years in Congress, the last few as Republican leader in the House.

In general terms, the voting record reveals that Ford ordinarily takes the conservative approach, and he has always shown much awareness for our national defense and its importance.

As I see it, it behooves all Americans to support any President, regardless of party affiliation, so long as he moves in the right direction.

THE FUTURE

That concludes a very sketchy discussion of the various Presidents who have served during the last third of a century. As we turn our attention to the future, there are many imponderables.

When I came to Congress the public debt was $43 billion. Today it approaches $400 billion. Interest alone on that debt exceeds $30 billion annually at this time.

It follows that the future of this country is linked very closely to the management of the public debt, to our fiscal policies, to our ability to spend no more than is taken in, and to hopefully begin a planned reduction on what the Nation owes. Control of inflation is closely related to the success of that policy.

We know that mismanagement of fiscal affairs, and a continuation of deficit spending, may very well lead to repudiation of debts, devaluation of the dollar, or other disastrous consequences.

BIG GOVERNMENT

Only recently I received a package, weighing nearly 4 pounds, which contains a listing of a multitude of Federal programs for assistance to the States. During the past two or three decades we have witnessed a frightening diminution of rights and responsibilities traditionally and properly belonging to the States and local governments.

The irony of much of this burgeoning practice, of getting checks from Washington, is that the only money the Federal Government has or can have is through the process of taxation. There cannot be much net gain from sending tax dollars to Washington, pay for the bookkeeping and overhead, and then returning what is left—or a portion of it—back to where it originated.

To process and administer these programs, big government has become bigger and bigger. American people have become captive of a sprawling bureaucracy over which they have little if any control. The Congress, through endless open-ended and often blank-check delegations of power, must bear most of the blame for this deplorable condition of government by bureaucracy.

Along with and as a part of this unhealthy development, has come power to issue arbitrary and often ill-considered controls and directives, many of which baffle and strangle normal business operations and local governmental functions. Think, for example, of the Occupational Safety and Health Act—OSHA—Office of Economic Opportunity—OEO—Equal Employment Opportunities Commission—EEOC—Environmental Protection Agency—EPA—and literally scores of others, too numerous to list here.

This trend has created an anomalous situation, where in reality the American people are getting far more Government than they need and more Government than they really want. But somehow Federal dollars have a magic appeal, and the stampede to Washington continues.

SUPER LOBBYISTS

This Federal growth has been goaded along by the presence of an array of what we will call super lobbyists. I am referring in particular to such power lobbyists as the Naders with their Raiders, the John Gardners with their Common Cause, the environmental and consumer extremists, and scores of others who make it their business to expolit popular issues—and get paid for it. It goes without saying that every sensible person wants pure water, clean air, a pleasant environment and good government. But I am speaking of the extremists in these movements.

Well heeled financially, and flexing their muscles, these ultraliberals would go further and change the structure of the Congress and the entire Government, subjects about which they so often know so little in practical terms.

What is needed in Washington these days is less Common Cause and more common sense.

All sorts of definitions are given those who participate in the tug-of-war over the productive energies of our people. Here is a definition of an extremist: He is one who when he attempts to look through a window and cannot see, chooses to break it instead of cleaning it.

A modern day liberal, not a genuine Jefferson-type liberal, is one who suffers from high-level feeling, low-level thinking, and has a constant urge to spend other people's money.

The country is plagued with this crop of pressure lobbyists. They are super salesmen when it comes to playing on emotions, viewing with alarm, and appealing for funds to carry on in pursuing their grand strategy for more power and control over governmental processes. Unfortunately, the rank-and-file so often get a distorted side of the picture that is cleverly presented to them.

NEWS MEDIA POSE DANGER

Again referring to the pressure groups and the trends—these people are often aided and abetted by like-minded segments of the news media. There are, of course, both responsible and irresponsible segments. I am speaking of the latter.

Freedom of the press is great, but abuse of that freedom may be worse than no freedom at all. It has been said that treason cannot be justified on the grounds of "freedom of the press" any more than rape can be justified on the grounds of "pursuit of happiness." In recent years we have seen a good many abuses in this regard, where news and documentaries are tainted with self-serving propaganda.

In this electronic age of television and radio, along with the printed word, a new dimension has been added to the responsibility of the media—a dimension never contemplated by the founding fathers who wrote the Constitution. At a time of instant communication, when a small farm house in a remote area gets the news the moment it is put on the air, and relies upon that source, the awesomeness of modern day media becomes self evident.

Thus, coordinated broadcasts, or advancement of a cause, can wield tremendous influence in the molding of public opinion. They possess the potential power to make or break an issue, or make or destroy an individual they like or dislike. To use an old adage, is this not more power than good men should have and more power than bad men should want?

Abuse and better control of this cherished freedom needs to be reexamined, in the light of what is best for the people who are, in a manner of speaking, at the mercy of the newscasters.

THE OUTLOOK

While the outlook for improvement is by no means hopeless, it is, to say the least, discouraging. It is a known fact that the general quality of the Congress has deteriorated in recent years. We all know that. Since every Member of the Congress is elected by the people, it follows that the public must assume responsibility in this respect.

The recent election scares me because it offers little likelihood for improvement. A total of 92 new Members were elected to the House in November. While I am sure some good men and women are among them, the press reports they are predominantly liberal, with an antimilitary mixture. The press reports many of them are committed to more welfare, more social services, bigger Government in Washington, less national defense.

Already ominous developments have taken place in caucuses held by House Democrats, including the 75 new Members who will be in the 94th Congress. The traditional and time-tested seniority system, which recognizes experience and assures a measure of stability in the all-important committee system, came under attack. Drastic changes were ordered in the committee selection process, designed to allow packing of certain key committees with inexperienced and often poorly qualified liberals.

Thus, instead of being realistic and progressive, it appears likely the next Congress will be moving backward in those respects. This so-called "reform" coincided with heavy lobby pressure which plugs for more social legislation, more Federal spending, a weaker national defense, and more Federal involvement in the lives of American people. To achieve these objectives, it is well known that lobbyists, like Common Cause, have for some time been demanding more liberal control of the congressional committee system. And it now appears they have achieved a resounding victory, at least for the present.

PARTY REALIGNMENT?

Mr. Speaker, has the evolution of the two-party system reached the point where in national elections the average voter is befuddled by lack of clear-cut ideological choices? Is it time for a realignment of political parties in order to better accommodate the electorate along broad philosophical lines?

A reading of platforms of the two major parties provides little comfort for those who seek an ideological preference.

In the Congress there is a mixture of conservatives and liberals in both parties, with liberals being more predominant among the Democrats. Republican Governors recently called for the GOP to move leftward in order to better compete with Democrats. The Republicans' affluent Ripon Society is notoriously liberal.

The National Democratic Party has evolved into a conglomerate, providing a shelter of convenience for scores of factions and shades of thinking, many of them poles apart in terms of ideology.

Many people have told me they would like to be able to vote "conservative," while others have said they would like their vote to be counted on the "liberal" side. Therefore, taking a page from the British, would it not be desirable to consider a realignment which would make such a choice available?

To argue that the modern-day Democratic Party is "the party of the people," and the Republican Party is "the party of entrenched wealth," and the like, is to beg the question and ignore reality. There are admittedly extremes in both parties. The question is: Does the present system really lend itself to meaningful choices on the part of average voters who, above factionalism, entertain overriding ideological preferences?

Perhaps such a realignment will eventually come, as necessity itself may dictate.

POWER OF THE PEOPLE

Despite the distressing picture, as related to big Government and the trends, I am optimistic. There will be other elections. Our Nation is not falling apart. It is still strong and viable.

Our strength essentially lies in the people and their capacity to discern and perform, at the ballot box and elsewhere, even in the face of adversity. Surely a Nation that has the capacity to land men on the moon has the ingenuity and the resources to learn the truth and find acceptable solutions for our problems, however difficult they may appear to be.

But it will take some doing, and the hour is growing late.

ED YOUNG

HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, Ed Young, though here a short time, made a record in this Congress that I am proud of. As his dean and colleague from South Carolina, I admired and respected him as much as any new Member who came here during the last quarter century. He was always affable, outgoing, and was good therapy just to be around.

Ed Young served our country with great honor and distinction during World War II. He was an outstanding combat pilot who helped turn back the tide of ruthless aggression in the Southwest Pacific. As a result of this experience, Ed Young has been determined to keep America strong to avoid war. He believes that the best way to preserve peace is through strength. Therefore, he supported every measure to strengthen our military for peace. Ed supported our veterans at every opportunity. He believes that a veteran who wore the uniform of our country in time of war is a special individual and that he, his widow and orphan are entitled to veterans preference. I shall always be grateful for his splendid cooperation in supporting our veterans and our peace forces deployed the world over.

Ed Young is truly a "son of the soil." Like Washington and Jefferson his first love is agriculture. He has devoted much of his time in and out of Congress to helping the American farmer. Ed Young knows better than anyone I know the necessity of keeping agriculture strong. Agriculture is the foundation of our economy and Ed Young has devoted much of his life to improving the lot of the farmer.

Ed Young is a Christian gentleman upholding always the highest standards of morality and ethics. He was a faithful member of the House Prayer Breakfast. When serving as an official in this group I could always depend on Ed Young to help in every possible way.

Ed Young's service here in the Congress was outstanding. He is a true statesman, a patriotic American and fearless fighter for noble causes. Mrs. Dorn joins me in wishing for Ed, his lovely wife Harriet, and wonderful and charming daughters every continued success and happiness always. They have my respect, admiration, and highest esteem.

RETIREMENT OF FRANK A. STUBBLEFIELDHON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ROONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, during my 30-plus years here in this Chamber it has been my pleasure to come to know and to serve with many fine men of extraordinary talent and abilities, men who have placed service to their country over and above their own desires and private lives. Such a man is my friend, the Honorable FRANK A. STUBBLEFIELD of Kentucky.

During FRANK's 16 years here in this body he has set a personal standard of dedication and devotion to duty that will stand for many years. He has greatly contributed to the betterment of both this legislative body and his beloved country.

I should like to advise the incoming new Members of this House, Mr. Speaker, that they use the record of FRANK STUBBLEFIELD of Kentucky as their yardstick and guide for their own careers while they are here in the House.

The people of the First District of Kentucky will greatly miss the able leadership and representation that FRANK has supplied them with over these past 16 years. Mrs. Rooney joins me in wishing FRANK STUBBLEFIELD a long, healthy, peaceful, and prosperous retirement in the many, many years to come.

TRIBUTE TO HON. WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN DORNHON. JAMIE L. WHITTEN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, it is with sincere regret that at the end of this present session, we will lose the services of our good friend, Congressman WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN DORN. He and I have served together for many years here, and our friendship has always been close.

An outstanding Member of Congress, chairman of the Veterans Committee, a most talented speaker and a tireless worker, BRYAN DORN will leave his mark on the annals of the Congress, a credit to him and to his family and one that we all could well emulate.

I join in the expressions made by his many friends here and wish for him and his family many happy and prosperous years.

HON. WILEY MAYNEHON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, our friend and colleague from Iowa, Hon. WILEY MAYNE, has rendered superb service to the Nation and will be greatly missed here. I am personally aware of his great efforts in behalf of the Nation's beef industry. And, of course, the Nation is appreciative of his legal statesmanship and his dedicated and conscientious treatment of one of the most difficult proceedings in the history of the Congress.

Mr. Speaker, WILEY MAYNE is one of the Nation's most distinguished attorneys and we predict for him a bright future in public service. He is a gentleman, one whom we were pleased to call a friend. To Congressman and Mrs. Mayne we wish much happiness and the best always.

RETIREMENT OF EDITH GREENHON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ROONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise again to pay tribute to my highly capable, distinguished colleague and friend from Oregon, the Honorable EDITH GREEN, as she, like myself, prepares to retire from this most august body.

The career of EDITH GREEN has been as diverse as it has been great. She has won numerous awards as a teacher, as a director of public relations for the Oregon Education Association, in commercial radio work, as well as a Member of this body. She has been awarded 29 honorary doctorate degrees including doctor of laws, humanities, humane letters, public affairs, and public administration.

The people of the third district of Oregon as well as all the rest of the American people will sorely miss the effective and capable leadership that has marked the long career of EDITH GREEN.

Her outstanding career in public service here in the House of Representatives may be used as a model of excellence and dedication by those who would follow in her footsteps.

Mrs. Rooney joins me in wishing EDITH GREEN and her sons Godspeed, glowing health, and happiness in her forthcoming retirement.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE 93D CONGRESS—REPORT TO THE PEOPLE OF THE 4TH DISTRICT OF WISCONSINHON. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, with the 93d Congress having just completed, as has been my practice ever since being elected as the Federal Representative of the Fourth District of Wisconsin, I submit a report of the major actions of the 93d Congress to my constituents. Obviously, this summary will not completely satisfy each and every one of them. There should be no doubt, however, that in representing the people of my district I have in good faith and conscience always tried to work in their best interests.

The last 2 years in our country, as well as in the world, have been a period of tension, uncertainty, and difficulty.

From severe food and energy shortages, to prolonged paralysis and instability in the executive branch, to double-digit inflation and deepening recession at the same time, to mass starvation in Africa and armed conflict in the Middle East, and other developments during the past 2 years have shaken the stability of the Western World. Without exaggeration, the confidence of the American people and the will of the 93d Congress to respond to these and other complex and serious problems had been under most severe strain.

December 20, 1974

Accordingly the 93d Congress has been particularly demanding and even, at times, exhausting. The 93d Congress was productive and responsive to many of the domestic and international problems facing our country. Significantly, the 93d Congress demonstrated its value as a stabilizing institution in our National Government, especially during the Watergate affair. Two Vice Presidents were confirmed under the new 25th amendment. The painful but necessary impeachment proceedings against former President Nixon were carried out in a responsible and constructive manner.

While the impeachment proceedings and subsequent resignation were undoubtedly dramatic and historic, they should not overshadow the legislative achievements of the 93d Congress which are of great importance to the American people, and which affect how our governmental system operates presently and for many years in the future.

The two major examples of legislation having tremendous implications on how our constitutional system will operate over a long term are the war powers resolution, of which I was proud to be the chief sponsor, and the Budget Impoundment Control Act. While impeachment has received most of the headlines during the 93d Congress, these two pieces of legislation will have far more impact in the years to come on how our Nation is governed.

As you have stated yourself, Mr. Speaker, the War Powers Resolution is a "historical" legislation returning to the Congress the constitutionality mandated power to declare war. Unfortunately, in the face of the complexity of the modern world, there had occurred a gradual erosion of the congressional war-making authority in the 20th century.

In enacting this landmark piece of legislation over a Presidential veto, the 93d Congress reasserted its constitutional right and responsibility to determine whether this Nation shall go to war.

Just as the War Powers Resolution returns to the Congress its proper role in foreign affairs, the Budget and Impoundment Control Act has given the legislative branch renewed vigor to act in domestic economic affairs. This reform measure gives the Congress both greater ability to exercise its power over the purse more effectively, as well as greater strength in dealing with impoundments of appropriations by the President.

The 93d Congress has also initiated, developed, and enacted major significant legislation protecting the security of a vast segment of the American people in passage of the pension reform bill. This legislation corrects many of the flaws in the private pension plans controlling the annuity rights of more than 30 million Americans. The law also assures workers their rights to their pensions, provides for pension reinsurance, and assists pension programs to be solvent.

Recognizing the need to restore public confidence and trust in our political system, the 93d Congress enacted the Campaign Finance Reform Act of 1974 to restrict the influence of big money in Federal elections. The new law sets limits on campaign expenditures and contributions and strengthens the dollar checkoff laws with respect to Presidential elections.

ECONOMY AND ENERGY

Our Nation is currently facing an unusually severe economic dilemma of continued double-digit inflation and a deepening recession at the same time. Compounding this situation has been the continuation of our domestic energy problems as seen in major price increases over the past 2 years and continued shortages of gas and oil.

In an attempt to put the country back on its financial feet, Congress stiffened antitrust laws including increased penalties for violations, and passed new trade reform legislation which will permit Presidential reduction of tariff barriers to stimulate trade.

In addition, legislation assisting those who have been most hurt by the economic crunch has been initiated. The Emergency Jobs and Unemployment Assistance Act was passed to fund an additional 300,000 public service jobs throughout the country. Additional provisions allow up to 13 weeks of federally financed extended unemployment benefits to those who have exhausted regular compensation and to those not covered under existing State unemployment laws.

Finally, in an effort to prevent food shortages and increase food production, Congress enacted the Food and Agriculture Act which is aimed at increasing farm production and thereby reducing pressures for higher food prices.

Long overdue legislation making the Nation less dependent upon foreign energy sources was completed by the 93d Congress. We authorized the immediate construction of the Alaskan pipeline; established maximum speed limits on national highways at 55 miles per hour; initiated programs to demonstrate the feasibility of using solar energy to heat and cool; and established an independent Federal Energy Administration to coordinate energy programs and to evaluate future energy supplies and needs.

SENIOR CITIZENS AND VETERANS

During the 93d Congress, approval was given to an 11-percent social security increase. In addition, benefits for our senior citizens were expanded under the Older Americans Act of 1965 and the Supplemental Security Income Act was enacted establishing minimum payments for the needy, blind, disabled, and aged.

Despite Presidential vetoes, the 93d Congress took effective action to assist veterans and their dependents. Education benefits were increased by 22.7 percent, monthly pension payments by 12 percent, and vocational rehabilitation benefits for veterans were extended. Approval was also given to a measure designed to help veterans obtain home loans and to extend veterans' eligibility for insured loans used to purchase condominiums.

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

The 93d Congress has been most constructive and innovative in the area of international affairs. During the first session, Congress adopted the already-mentioned war powers resolution. In addition, following the leadership of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Congress initiated major foreign assistance legislation directing U.S. aid to the poorest peoples in the less-developed countries.

During the second session, Congress strengthened its oversight of U.S. overseas operations and approved a revised Foreign Assistance Act vitally important to the future conduct of U.S. foreign policy.

For the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on National Security Policy and Scientific Developments, which it is my privilege to chair, the 93d Congress was a particularly active and in many ways successful 2 years. First among its accomplishments was the already-mentioned War Powers Act of 1973.

In addition, the subcommittee held extensive hearings on U.S. chemical warfare policy. The new understanding generated in these hearings is credited with the Senate's recent and unanimous ratification of the Geneva Protocol and the Biological Convention both of which represent significant restraints against chemical warfare. The hearings were also instrumental in deleting the appropriation of $5.8 million in funds for a new binary nerve gas weapons system.

Finally, as a result of the subcommittee's study and hearings on the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, proposed legislation will be presented early in the 94th Congress to strengthen the role of the agency in furthering U.S. arms control policies and enhancing the prospects of reducing defense expenditures by successfully negotiating additional reductions of nuclear and non-nuclear armaments.

THE 94TH CONGRESS

Mr. Speaker, in citing these accomplishments I realize that I have not mentioned all the activities but rather to highlight some of the major actions which characterize the responsible and effective performance of this Congress.

Notwithstanding the many accomplishments of the 93d Congress, there is important business for the 94th Congress to consider and act upon over the next 2 years. As we approach the next 2 years, Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate our fellow colleagues who, under your fine leadership, manifested the necessary dedication and courage to respond to the admittedly difficult and turbulent past 2 years. Indeed, I am most proud to have served in the 93d Congress and strongly feel that it can serve as a positive example to the Members of the 94th Congress.

Mr. Speaker, let us look forward to the challenges of the 94th Congress and, on my part, I pledge to continue to do my utmost on behalf of the people of the Fourth Congressional District of Wisconsin and the Nation.

The following is a summary of my attendance record, position, and voting record on some of the major issues considered during the 93d Congress:

"FISHBAIT" MILLER

HON. O. C. FISHER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, tributes are in order for William M. "Fishbait" Miller, who is retiring as Doorkeeper of the House. He is a product of the great State of Mississippi. It is my understanding he has been identified with the House of Representatives for more than 40 years, assigned to a variety of duties. Because he performed so well some 25 years ago, he was chosen for one of the most important "housekeeping" positions in this body, a job that requires him to oversee several hundred employees. It is a highly responsible position.

"Fishbait" is all business. His job has been his life. No one could be more devoted and attentive to duty. He has given an excellent account of his stewardship, and I commend him for a job well done and extend my best wishes for him and his family.

THE PARDON OF THE PRESIDENT

HON. BELLA S. ABZUG

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Ms. ABZUG. Mr. Speaker, Dan Crystal, a fine lawyer and writer, and a good friend, has written what I consider to be one of the definitive pieces on the legal questions surrounding the pardon. The article appeared in the Reporter, the journal of the Passaic County Bar Association and I commend it to the attention of my colleagues:

DID PRESIDENT FORD ABUSE HIS PARDON POWERS?—MR. FORD, MR. JAWORSKI, AND THE PARDON

(By Daniel Crystal)

The unprecedented appearance of President Gerald Ford before a House Judiciary Subcommittee to answer Resolutions of Inquiry propounded by Representatives Bella S. Abzug of Manhattan and John Conyers, Jr., of Michigan as to the facts surrounding his precipitous pardon of former President Richard M. Nixon came during the same week in October in which Special Prosecutor Leon Jaworski resigned saying that in his legal judgment the pardon was legal, proper, and timely.

A long time ago Ira Gershwin wrote sardonically in Porgy and Bess, "It Ain't Necessarily So." The statements by the President and by the Special Prosecutor are most impressive. One can fully accept them as made in utter good faith. Yet inescapable, deeply troubling questions remain as to the wisdom and judgment involved in the separate, but closely interlinked, actions in the continuing Watergate drama of the grant of the pardon, the approach taken by the Special Prosecutor toward the pardon and his own sweeping powers of investigation and approving an indictment, and the legal basis in which the President justified the pardon and its possible conflict with the charter granted Mr. Jaworski as Special Prosecutor.

Whether or not there was a previous "deal" between the then President Nixon and Gerald Ford, the man waiting in the wings to become President, is not really the key issue in this current act in the Watergate melodrama, but instead whether there has been perhaps irreparable damage done to the fundamental concept that ours is a system of law where all men stand equal at the bar of justice, and there are not two scales of justice, one for the powerful and the other for the ordinary citizen without powerful friends in high office.

As Representative Elizabeth Holtzman (D. N.Y.) pointed out during the historic first time appearance of a sitting President of the United States before a Congressional committee, there are "dark suspicions that have been created in the public mind" as to this hasty and premature pardon of a former President who hasn't even been charged with any "offense" or crime. Her sharp questioning of President Ford (objectable to some as "accusatory", but realistically dealing with questions the country has a right to know, and which the President ignored) included how he explained the failure to consult with the Attorney General of the United States with respect to the issuance of the pardon, even though in his confirmation hearing he had indicated that the Attorney General's opinion would be critical in any decision to pardon the former President. She asked the valid, and entirely pertinent question, as to how President Ford "can explain not having consulted Leon Jaworski, the special prosecutor, before approving the tape agreement." And she properly asked, "How can the extraordinary haste in which the pardon was decided on, and the secrecy with which it was carried out, be explained?"

These, and the other relevant questions which she and a few other members of the subcommittee asked pose important issues going far beyond the question of whether long-time political friends and allies, Richard M. Nixon and Gerald Ford, made a "deal" as to Presidential succession and pardon.

As the New York Times said in an editorial on Oct. 18 following Mr. Ford's appearance before the Judiciary subcommittee, "It was the secrecy and the lack of consultation, as well as basic evidence of peer judgment that raises questions about Mr. Ford's capacity to govern and about whether the President's mode of making great decisions was really any more open or satisfactory than that of his predecessor."

And this penetrating Times editorial added:

"The hearing skipped blithely past the fundamental question whether the pardon itself was valid. Despite the certitude expressed by the President, by some of his questioners, and by Special Prosecutor Leon Jaworski, there is a respectable body of scholarly legal opinion that this precipitate use of the pardoning power covering all crimes known and unknown and unjustifiable. It is also arguable that granting a pardon to a President who aborted the impeachment process by resigning violates at least the spirit of the Constitution which excepts cases of impeachment alone from the President's pardoning power."

December 20, 1974

Moreover, the legal issues involved here go even deeper. The unanimous decision of the Supreme Court this summer dealing with President Nixon's tapes held that the charter establishing the Office of the Special Prosecutor, and the accompanying enforcement regulation promulgated by the Department of Justice, constituted a waiver of the President's power to claim executive privilege. What legal scholars are insistently asking is whether there was not an identical and parallel waiver by the President of his pardoning powers in the area in which the Special Prosecutor was given sweeping jurisdiction both to investigate fully the acts of President Nixon and all others involved in what is generically known as Watergate, and to take criminal action following full investigation.

Viewed from this light, a concomitant question arises as to whether Mr. Jaworski's consent to the exercise by President Ford of allegedly broad and unlimited powers to pardon, coupled with his resignation and public statements supporting President Ford's action, do not constitute "deserting the ship" and dereliction of duty on his part, amounting to abdication of his solemnly assumed duties to the detriment of justice itself.

It is clear that there are a number of grounds on which the sweeping advance pardon of Mr. Nixon could have been challenged in court by Mr. Jaworski. Indeed, it appears that a number of Congressional leaders continue to have independent standing, even without the concurrence of the Special Prosecutor, to challenge the validity of the pardon. This is because the regulation establishing Mr. Jaworski's office specifies that "the jurisdiction of the special prosecutor will not be limited without the presidents first consulting with" the majority and minority leaders of Congress and the chairmen and ranking minority members of the House and Senate Judiciary committees. As a practical matter, it may well be that there has been a tacit understanding between the President, the Congressional leadership, and Mr. Jaworski to close the books on the presidential pardon and on indictment of Mr. Nixon on any criminal charges growing out of Watergate. Any such political decision has little relevancy, however, to whether there is a valid basis to judicial challenge of the pardon. It is merely the age-old distinction between the existence of power and the question whether to exercise the power. And what may well be an unspoken agreement at the highest levels of immunize Mr. Nixon from further investigation and criminal sanctions on the ground that his resignation is punishment enough should lead to searching reexamination of both the impeachment article of the Constitution and the Twenty-fifth Amendment pursuant to which President Gerald Ford took office, to determine whether they both need modification, perhaps by adoption of a new constitutional provision calling for new national elections where a President or Vice President has been impeached or has resigned to avoid impeachment.

1. Was Mr. Nixon pardoned for an "offense"? Among the questions asked at the Judiciary subcommittee hearing on October 17 by Rep. Holtzman was how he could explain having pardoned Richard Nixon without specifying any of the crimes for which he was pardoned, and, further, how he could explain pardoning the former President without obtaining any acknowledgment of guilt from him.

Concededly, a President has the right to pardon for what the Constitution calls an "offense." But is there an "offense" before there is specification of what the governmental official facing criminal indictment is charged with? And since, of necessity, the undefined "offense" for which the pardon power must be exercised may not be on which is a "case of impeachment", there is a profound constitutional question here calling for judicial review as to whether the unnamed and unspecified "offense" or offenses" for which President Ford pardoned Mr. Nixon are in actuality impeachable offenses as to which his pardon power simply does not apply. This is because Article II, Section 2 provides that a President can pardon only in certain kinds of offenses—"Offenses against the United States except in cases of impeachment."

The history of Mr. Ford's shifting position, particularly as demonstrated at the committee hearing, is most instructive on this point.

Clearly, the President was pardoning any federal offenses with which Mr. Nixon was charged—except for the uncomfortable fact that he hasn't yet been charged with any, let alone convicted. He first tried to solve this dilemma by speaking of a pardon for all such crimes as Mr. Nixon "may have committed." However, there is a self-evident absurdity in giving an undefined pardon for undefined crimes. This led Mr. Ford later to say he thought Mr. Nixon had admitted guilt by accepting the pardon. On this reasoning, the pardon was for crimes Mr. Nixon had committed (not may have committed). Nevertheless, the question persists: What crimes, exactly, particularly in the light of the presumption of innocence?

Questioned prior to the hearing as to whether he still maintained Mr. Nixon's innocence, Mr. Ford said "No," and gave as his grounds the unanimous vote of the House Judiciary Committee to impeach Nixon for obstruction of justice in the first count of its bill of particulars.

Yet, if this is so, it is saying that Mr. Nixon was de facto guilty of the "high crimes and misdemeanors" charged in that count. These were the only legal charges outstanding at the time of the pardon. It was clearly on this charge that Mr. Ford found Mr. Nixon guilty, yet nevertheless pardoned him. But in that case, it is equally plain that there is a "Catch 22" involved in the pardon. Mr. Ford was exercising a pardon "in cases of impeachment"—which is expressly forbidden by the Constitution.

This analysis is clearly supported by Mr. Ford's own statement at the subcommittee hearing. He was questioned by a friendly member of the subcommittee, Rep. Lawrence J. Hogan (R. Md.), who asked: "So those who say you should have waited until there were formalized charges, really are overlooking the fact that there was a very formalized charged and indictment, if you will, by this committee."

The President's response to this helpful questioning implicitly concedes that his stated ground for exercising his pardon power flouted the impeachment exception to those broad powers:

"PRESIDENT. Well, the unanimous vote of the House Committee on the Judiciary—all 35 members—certainly is very substantial evidence that the former President was guilty of an impeachable offense."

"There's no doubt in my mind that that recommendation of this full committee would have been carried in the House, which would have been even more formal as an indication of criminal activity or certainly, to be more specific, an impeachable offense. And of course, the prospect in the Senate with such a formidable vote in the committee and in the House would have been even more persuasive."

2. Was the "impeachment exception" to the pardon-power clause violated? It seems irrefutable that Mr. Ford has violated the whole spirit of the pardoning clause by basing his exercise of those powers upon a determination that Mr. Nixon had committed (in Mr. Ford's own words) "an impeachable offense." He probably violated the latter as well. He sought by forensic logic to close the book on one case of executive wrong-doing. Acting in secret, without consulting the pardon attorney of the Department of Justice, the Attorney General given broad independent powers under the enabling legislation that established the Office of Special Prosecutor, the Cabinet, or any one other than his own appointed legal counsel, he committed another instance of executive wrong-doing. His actions make a mockery of the impeachment except to Article II, Section 2.

And that exception, as legal scholars and others have been increasingly pointing out, is firmly rooted in English legal history. I. F. Stone, the well-known investigative reporter, pointed out for example in an Op-Ed article in the New York Times on October 9:

"That exception goes back to 17th century England. In two cases that read like a preview of Watergate, the Crown was subjected to parliamentary control. The impeachment of the Duke of Buckingham under Charles I established the principle that, although the King could do no wrong, miscreant ministers could not avoid impeachment by pleading that they were merely carrying out his orders."

"There still remained a loophole, and a second case closed it. The Earl of Derby tried to block his own impeachment with a pardon granted in advance by Charles II. The Commons refused to honor the pardon. It ruled that to permit a pardon to be a bar to an impeachment would defeat its purpose and thereby the chief institution for the preservation of the Government would be destroyed. The King could pardon after, but not before, an impeachment had been completed."

"Our Federal Constitution, and most constitutions, go further and do not permit a pardon even after an impeachment. Did not Mr. Ford's pardon of Richard M. Nixon in advance of full investigation violate the spirit and purpose, if not the letter, of this ancient constitutional exception to the pardoning power?"

3. Does a Supreme Court Dictum Justify the Pardon? Presumably, the answer of President Ford to this challenge to the pardon will be reliance upon a dictum in Ex Parte Garland, 71 U.S. 33 (1867) declaring that the President may pardon before an indictment. The dictum does not, of course, meet head-on the separate issue of whether a President may pardon for what is actually an impeachable offense, as he himself justified it to the Judiciary subcommittee.

The dictum in Ex Parte Garland was carefully analyzed by Rep. Bella S. Abzug in the October issue of The Reporter. She concluded that it does not support the pardon.

Moreover, the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court this past summer in United States v. Nixon presents a firm adjudication that the limitations placed upon the President in interfering with the independence of the Office of Special Prosecutor are binding upon the President. If the pardon power is one of the "constitutional powers" covered by the terms of the regulation establishing the Office of the Special Prosecutor, then the President could not use that, or any other claimed constitutional power, to encroach on the territory reserved for the special prosecutor." This holding clearly supersedes a dictum without force of an actual holding set forth in the last century under totally different factual and legal circumstances.

Concededly, Mr. Jaworski stated in his letter of resignation that he did not regard his mandate as limiting the President's pardoning powers. This is but one specific indication of the limited views he took of his mandate, which demand objective assessment as to whether he measured up to the responsibilities of the high office he assumed, and, further, whether the interpretation of his mandate was his responsibility alone, or should have been made by our courts in the normal adversary process.

4. Did President Ford Interfere With the

December 20, 1974

Special Prosecutor's Mandate? The resignation of Mr. Jaworski with bland statement that the work of the Special Prosecutor had been largely completed, coupled with his repeated declaration that he fully accepted Mr. Ford's pardon of Mr. Nixon, raises serious questions as to the manner in which Mr. Jaworski read his mandate.

Dispassionate analysis of that mandate confirms the view of an increasing number of legal scholars that the strongest basis for a valid legal attack upon the pardon may not be the Constitution, which expressly vests in the President the power to pardon, "except in cases of impeachment," but instead in the regulation establishing the Office of the Special Prosecutor.

This regulation vests in the special prosecutor "full authority for investigating and prosecuting" the Watergate affair, and other allegations involving the 1972 election, the President, his assistants, and his appointees. The regulation was the basis of the reversal of the Archibald Cox dismissal by Federal District Court Judge, Gerhard Gesell.

The regulation provided, "In accordance with assurances given by the President to the Attorney General . . . the President will not exercise his constitutional powers to limit the independence the (Special Prosecutor) is hereby given." And, as earlier noted, it specifies further that this jurisdiction will not be limited without the President first consulting with designated senior members of Congress.

The regulation was issued as a regulation of the Justice Department. It is still on the books. President Ford was required to comply with all its terms. United States v. Nixon drives home this point sharply. The Supreme Court there held unanimously that, "So long as this regulation remains in force, the executive branch is bound to it."

On Sunday, October 6, in an Op-Ed article in the New York Times, Richard A. Sprague, first assistant district attorney of Philadelphia, who was Special Prosecutor in the famous Yablonski murder case, concluded that the pardon of Mr. Nixon was illegal in view of the binding commitment given by the President that he would not interfere with the work of Special Prosecutor Jaworski.

Mr. Sprague there emphasized that, "for his own integrity, his own oath of office, and his obligation to the American public to uphold the independence and integrity of his office," Mr. Jaworski was under an inescapable duty to challenge in court the Nixon pardon. In his words:

"Neither former President Nixon nor President Ford could have directed the Special Prosecutor to stop his investigation and prosecution of Mr. Nixon or any alleged Watergate conspirator."

"If, as the Supreme Court has held, there has been a Presidential waiver of constitutional power to interfere with the independence and jurisdiction of the special prosecutor, it can logically be concluded that there has been a similar waiver of Presidential pardoning power that would interfere with these same investigations, prosecutions, and jurisdiction."

"Indirect interference should not be permitted any more than direct interference."

5. Has Mr. Jaworski Been Guilty of Dereliction of Duty? The resignation of Mr. Jaworski coupled with his publicly stated support of the President's pardon unavoidably raises the question as to whether he is guilty of abdication of his legal responsibilities under his mandate. Special Prosecutor Archibald Cox will be judged by history to have measured up fully to his heavy responsibilities. It seems clear that the parallel verdict with respect to Mr. Jaworski will be largely to the contrary. Wholly apart from whether he was entirely too lenient in plea bargaining resulting, for example, in surprisingly mild disposition of what appears to have been admitted perjury by former Attorney General

Richard Kleindienst, it appears unanswerable that he deprived the country of the full truth by meekly accepting a pardon which is highly suspect, as running foul of Article II, Section 2, of the Constitution prohibiting pardons "in cases of impeachment." And he has timidly shrunk from grasping the nettle of confrontation with President Ford as to the latter's blatant interference with the broad investigative powers expressly given to the Special Prosecutor by the charter and Department of Justice regulation establishing that office.

In a scathing Op-Ed article, Jaworski's Record: A Dissent Anthony E. Davis, Assistant Dean of New York Law School, wrote on October 16, that "the full and unconditional pardon of Mr. Nixon, followed at the earliest moment decency would allow, by Mr. Jaworski's resignation" is the mark of the third of his great failures as Special Prosecutor.

Mr. Davis listed as the "first of the prosecutorial challenges Mr. Jaworski ducked" the issue of whether to seek the indictment of Richard M. Nixon while Mr. Nixon was President. His second criticism of Mr. Jaworski's work as Special Prosecutor was failure to seek an indictment of Mr. Nixon once he ceased to be President. And with respect to the failure to challenge the pardon, he wrote: "President Ford's pardon is no more sacrosanct than any other executive action, in that it is as subject to challenge in the courts as any other executive act."

Mr. Davis' criticism of Mr. Jaworski on this point is eminently worthy quoting:

"Once again, Mr. Jaworski was in a position to have the issue determined in the courts by indicting Mr. Nixon, waiting for the pardon to be raised in defense, and leaving to the courts the final decision as to its constitutionality."

"Once again, he failed to test a legal uncertainty that it was his clear office to do. Once again, he allowed his own view of the legality of an issue to preclude its determination by the courts."

"It is hard to see how Mr. Jaworski could have done less during his tenure. Accordingly, the question we must ask—and if we do not, the historians assuredly will—is, Why did he do no more?"

Constitutional Weaknesses Made Manifest: It may well be that the politicians in Congress and whoever succeeds to the position of Special Prosecutor will fail to have the political courage to deal with these issues. There may well be that there is now tacit agreement in governmental leadership to try to sweep Watergate under the rug once and for all.

The inescapable responsibility of attorneys who value the Constitution is to establish the record plain beyond dispute.

And in that analysis of how the Constitution impinges on Watergate, it is abundantly clear that the constitutional scheme has been aborted by the process of Presidential resignation in the face of virtually certain impeachment and conviction, followed by an unlimited pardon for unspecified "offenses" by a successor President, who is a political ally and long-time crony, hand-picked to be Vice President by that same President already facing investigation that might lead to impeachment charges. It may be that the letter of Article II, Section 2, of the Constitution has not been violated. However, the spirit of that article has clearly been flouted.

The entire country watched with admiration while the individual members of the House Judiciary Committee wrestled with their consciences, and, in most cases, showed themselves to be dedicated to the Constitution, regardless of the possible consequences to their own political careers.

Now that the penultimate moves have been taken in the Watergate drama, and further investigation into the crimes and "offenses" of Richard M. Nixon has apparently been closed off by exercise of Presidential pardon power in a gray area of dubious constitutionality, it is mandatory for the same members of the House Judiciary Committee, and their colleagues on the Senate Judiciary Committee, to rise again to their perhaps uncomfortable rendezvous with destiny. This time their inescapable duty is to review Article II, Section 2, of the Constitution, together with the Twenty-Fifth Amendment, in the light of the lessons of Watergate to determine whether there is a demonstrable need to propose a new amendment to the Constitution that will fairly and completely close off the escape hatches of the Constitution which have made it possible for a President of the United States to escape both impeachment and prosecution.

The issue is not in the slightest whether Mr. Ford made an overt deal with Mr. Nixon, General Alexander Haig, or some other intermediary. It is instead whether as Representative James Mann (D. S.C.) and Representative Don Edwards (D. Cal.) each independently asked President Ford at the Judiciary Subcommittee hearings, this country should remain dedicated to the concept of equal justice under law, and whether there should be different treatment for a former President of the United States who has violated the law than there should be for any other criminal. Political timidity now will not prevent history from demanding an answer to that question.

NORTH KOREA BRAGS ON POLITICAL CONTRADICTIONS

HON. ROBERT L. LEGGETT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. LEGGETT. Mr. Speaker, would you believe that a Communist government seething with hatred of the United States, would take two full-page ads in some America's lending dailies extolling the virtues of independence under a Communist system?

That is exactly what Kim Il Sung and the North Korean Government are doing.

Can you imagine what would happen if the United States attempted to spell out its foreign and domestic policies in North Korea?

The irony of the situation is that the North Koreans, experiencing slightly improved support in the United Nations would jump to the conclusion that the people of the United States would buy their whole crock of crackers.

Kim Il Sung talks of "independence" as keeping man alive on the one hand as opposed to "the critical need to remold man's ideology by the state in a revolutionary manner lest he be a moral degenerate."

He talks of peaceful unification of Korea on the one hand, but on the other that the immediate task of the people of Korea is to fight for the forceful struggle to reunify the Korean peoples.

It is truly sad that the Communist myopia has so consumed the north of Korea in this crazy fanaticism that the freedom of the other peoples of Asia is continuously jeopardized.

Many times we too in the United States become too myopic with respect to conditions in South Korea. We have criticized President Park's decrees and convictions; he has set aside two of the decrees and some of the convictions of violators. I believe he can do more and for that reason I supported the restrictions in the 1975 foreign aid bill. Communist Jack Anderson has indicated that he has some appreciation of the South Korean motivation and apprehension. I do not believe any American can read Kim Il Sung's two newspaper page diatribe and not get the feeling that the East is once again meeting the West with a maximum degree of misunderstanding.

Portions of Kim Il Sung's admitted self-evident contradictions follow:

... Proceeding from the Marxist-Leninist proposition that cooperation, even based on primitive techniques, is far superior to private farming and considering the actual fact that our peasants badly needed to work together to free themselves from the difficult situation, we adopted an original method—boldly pushing ahead with the socialist transformation of agriculture before industrialization. As regards the small and medium entrepreneurs and rich peasants we also chose a unique way—embracing them in the cooperatives and remoulding them on socialist lines because there was no necessity to expropriate them.

... Independence is what keeps man alive. If he loses independence in society, he cannot be called a man; he differs little from an animal. We can say that sociopolitical life is more valuable than physical life to a man, a social being. If he is forsaken by society and deprived of political independence, though he is alive, he is virtually dead as social human being. That is why the revolutionaries deem it far more honourable to die in the fight for freedom than to keep themselves alive in slavery.

... The principle of independence in politics demands complete equality and mutual respect among all nations. It opposes being subjugated by others and subjugating others. A nation that subjugates others can never be free itself.

... Our people have fought to get rid of the yoke of imperialism for a long time, but our national sovereignty is still being trampled underfoot by foreign aggressors in one-half of our territory. For our people today there is no more pressing matter than to drive out foreign aggressors and establish national sovereignty throughout our country.

... Our immediate task is to see that all the people in north and south Korea fight against outside forces in the spirit of independence and self-reliance and rise in the forceful struggle for the independent, peaceful reunification of the country.

... Only when people have ideological and cultural developments which they should possess as social beings, can they participate in all aspects of social life as masters and energetically accelerate the revolution and construction. This is why our Party always places greater emphasis on education than on any other work.

We regard as the central matter in education the implementation of the principles of socialist pedagogy. The master principle of socialist pedagogy lies in training people to be reliable revolutionary workers equipped with the ideology, knowledge and strong physique that will enable them to take part in the revolution and construction as masters.

The most important thing in training and educating people is to remould their ideology in a revolutionary way. All activities of people are determined by their ideology. If a

RETIREMENT OF EDITH GREEN

HON. O. C. FISHER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to join with my colleagues in paying tribute to EDITH GREEN of Oregon, who is retiring at the end of the 93d Congress.

Mrs. GREEN has for years been one of the most valuable and most effective members of the House. Able and eloquent, her patriotic devotion and sound judgment have made of her a leader of prominence.

At a time when according to polls the country can ill afford to lose the services of such outstanding members as the gentlewoman from Oregon. She has served the country well and her presence will be sorely missed.

To Mrs. GREEN I extend my commendation for her services in the Congress, and my very best wishes for her future endeavors.

ON H. R. GROSS' RETIREMENT

HON. RICHARD H. ICHORD

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join today in this tribute to Congressman H. R. Gross who has announced his retirement after 13 terms of distinguished service in this body. It is with a profound sense of regret that I learned of H. R.'s retirement and am deeply sorry that the 94th Congress will be bereft of his farsighted and dedicated fight to restore fiscal and monetary responsibility to the Federal Government.

For 25 years H. R. Gross has led a determined, and often lonely, battle to reduce Federal expenditures, balance the budget, and retire the national debt. Each year, the Members of this body have heard H. R. rise in opposition to spending bills or point out rational and orderly ways to reduce the annual budget. Each year, H. R. introduced a resolution requiring Congress to undertake concerted action to pay off the national debt. Each year, H. R. framed legislation to restore fiscal integrity to Federal budgeting. And yet each year, his efforts have met with failure and I know that there were many of us who shared his anger and frustration as we watched the Federal budget soar over $300 billion, the national debt approach the $500 billion mark, and the economy relentlessly deteriorate in the absence of any responsible action.

H. R. Gross has become to many Americans the symbol of congressional integrity and independence. Since his announced retirement, many of my own constituents from Missouri have written in expressing their concern and regret that Congress is losing a man whom the Almanac of American Politics once referred to as "the House's reigning curmudgeon... a man who personifies American Gothic virtues—thriftiness, attention to detail, orneriness." H. R.'s "ornerness," however, has resulted since 1949 in better Congresses and better Congressmen. Any bill that reached the House floor was sure to have had the thorough perusal of HAROLD ROYCE Gross, and I know of many Members who took extra care in justifying their proposals and expenditures because of their knowledge of H. R.'s unfailing search for some new abuse of American taxpayers.

H. R. also never allowed the buck to be passed—he never succumbed to scapegoating. When the economy fell apart or when some new outcry was raised on Congress about usurpation of congressional authority, H. R. Gross would throw the problem right back on Congress where the budget priorities and levels were set up and where the executive received its delegated authorities.

H. R. Gross never let up, and by his own admission, he is now tired of the enormous workload he constantly shouldered and tired of the frustrations his dedicated efforts constantly met. He says that it is time for him to now retire, to go fishing, and to spend more time with his family. And there is no one who will deny that H. R. Gross has certainly done more than his share in serving his Nation. But it is my sincere hope that in his retirement this body will see fit to pay him one final farewell tribute. In the beginning months of the 94th session, I would hope that the new Congress will pass Mr. Gross' resolution to pay off the national debt, pass legislation or a constitutional amendment which would require a mandatory balanced budget, and act in a concerted manner to hold down Federal spending.

Mr. Speaker, H. R.'s proven leadership qualities and legislative talents have made him one of the most respected and effective Members of this body, and it was a great and distinct privilege to have had the opportunity to serve with him in this body. His presence will be missed by his colleagues in the House, by his Iowa constituents in the Third District, and by the American people.

RETIREMENT OF WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

Mr. ROONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I should like to compliment the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina, the Honorable WILLIAM BRYAN DORN upon his completion of 26 years of outstanding service here in the House of Representatives.

WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN DORN, as was his namesake, was a boy wonder of politics. He was first elected to the South Carolina House in 1939 at the age of 23 years and elected to the South Carolina State Senate and seated by a special vote at the age of 24 years. After 3½ years in the Army Air Force during World War II BRYAN returned to South Carolina and was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives at the age of 30 years. His is a great record of public service and one that will stand for a long time in the State of South Carolina before it will be matched.

JOHN BLATNIK

HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, JOHN BLATNIK is one of the truly great committee chairmen of modern times. During the time of his superb leadership of the House Public Works Committee, legislation has become law which will improve the quality of life for every American. Water quality and even water shortages are problems for billions of people the world over. But for the American people, due to the untiring efforts of JOHN BLATNIK they can look forward to the best water standards known to man. Under his able leadership our country now has not only water quality, but adequate water supplies through a public works and water conservation program second to none in the entire world. Our rivers, harbors, reservoirs, watersheds, and the most insignificant streams and water sources have had his constant attention and concern.

JOHN BLATNIK led the fight for undeveloped areas, providing opportunity for the unemployed and underemployed. He will go down in history as one of the great architects of the policy for a better environment, beautification, forestry, and conservation. He has been equally devoted to improving life in our great cities and in the most isolated, rural community. He helped launch the greatest public works project in world history—our fabulous Interstate Highway System. He presided over our committee when the completion of that great highway program was assured. These are only a few of the great programs for America that JOHN BLATNIK fought for and inaugurated. As a committee chairman, he always presided with dignity, fairness, and understanding. I never saw him excited, ruffled, or emotional. He was always our cool, calm, dedicated chairman.

JOHN BLATNIK is an all-American Congressman serving every section of our country with equal honor and distinction. He has devoted his entire life to public service. First as a teacher and administrator and then as State senator and as a soldier during World War II. In our Armed Forces he served with great honor as an accomplished officer on foreign soil. He thus became sympathetic to those who went from our native shores to save the free world from ruthless aggression. He supported every single bit of legislation to help our returning veterans of World War II, Korea, and Vietnam.

JOHN BLATNIK came to Congress in the famous 80th Congress and has served continuously now for 28 years. His record is one of accomplishment and achievement, a record that new Members can emulate and look to for guidance. As a result of JOHN BLATNIK's outstanding service, America is a better place to live and the cause of freedom more secure around the world.

His wife, the former Gisela Hager, is a charming and lovely lady who stood by JOHN in his dedication to public service. JOHN and his wonderful wife and family will always have my admiration, respect, and highest esteem. We formed a strong friendship over the years which I will always value and cherish. We are glad that JOHN BLATNIK came this way. We wish for him much happiness and every continued success.

THE NURSING HOME SCANDAL

HON. EDWARD I. KOCH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Speaker, on January 21, Senator FRANK MOSS' Subcommittee on Long Term Care will hold a hearing in New York City on Medicaid and Medicare abuses perpetrated by nursing home operators. I will join Senator MOSS in conducting this hearing along with Assemblyman Andrew Stein, chairman of the temporary State commission on Living Costs, also investigating this scandal. In preparing for this hearing, Senator MOSS has issued 40 subpoenas to persons involved in the nursing home industry in New York State and has requested that the Internal Revenue Service and General Accounting Office commence their investigation into these areas as well.

The Senate subcommittee's hearing is in response to my request to Senator MOSS on December 12 that a nationwide examination be commenced of the fraudulent practices in the Medicaid and Medicare programs. In 1973, we spent some $8.7 billion on Medicaid and $9.5 billion on Medicare. What is so tragic is that we are spending these enormous sums for care that is inadequate and for living conditions for the elderly that are often inhumane. In the instance of Medicaid in particular, the "cost plus" basis for charging for care has opened the program to extensive and costly fraud. It is time that this form of white-collar crime come under close scrutiny and be rooted out.

I also have urged that investigations be commenced at the State level. On December 12, 17 members of the New York congressional delegation joined me in requesting that Governor HUGH CAREY set up a Moreland commission to investigate the Medicaid/Medicare scandal.

In response, he asked Mario Cuomo, a close adviser, to make a preliminary investigation of the alleged fraud for review in early January.

I know that Mario Cuomo will provide a valuable preliminary investigation. But it is important that it be only the beginning for a comprehensive Moreland Commission investigation, having the power to issue subpoenas and the power to initiate proceedings before a grand jury is also needed. One of the problems we face in New York State is that there has been too cozy a relationship among the nursing home proprietors, the directors, State public officeholders and law enforcement agencies. Indeed, the State welfare inspector general's office which has audited a number of the State's nursing homes has found that the department of health, responsible for administering Medicaid funds, has known about many of the irregularities but failed to do anything about them and failed to provide adequate supervision of nursing home expenditures and Medicaid and Medicare receipts.

In one instance, that of the Towers Nursing Home, the welfare inspector general's office found that the books do not balance and that millions of dollars in unaccounted disbursements have been made. Towers Nursing Home, located in Manhattan, has had an average annual income of $2,369,833 from Medicaid alone during the past 3 years.

The revelations in New York State are alarming; but what is more important is that this is not simply a New York scandal. It is one which undoubtedly is duplicated in other States as well and runs into billions of dollars. We have waited too long to examine into these fraudulent practices whose impact is not only on the Federal Treasury, but also on the lives of the elderly citizens of the country. In some cases people are effectively condemned to die in squalid nursing homes, friendless with a feeling that their Government has deserted them.

In preparation for the hearing on January 21, I am gathering information on individuals' experience with nursing homes. I also am preparing legislation to provide alternative care for those who really do not need nursing homes. Many people now in such long-term care facilities do not need 24-hour-a-day medical attention and would be better off at home assisted by homemaking services. But, today Medicaid does not pay for this type of care, despite the fact that home care would be less costly than the average $1,800 a month paid for nursing home care and would provide a much happier life for the elderly person involved. This must be changed.

TRIBUTE TO THE HONORABLE CHET HOLIFIELD BY THE HONORABLE JOHN E. MOSS

HON. JOHN E. MOSS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, CHET HOLIFIELD, dean of California's congressional delegation, is, to the regret of his colleagues and the public, retiring from Congress after 32 years of outstanding public service; a term never exceeded by any California member since our State was admitted to the Union in 1850. It is a well-earned retirement for an outstanding, much respected, and much loved man.

During his tenure in this House, particularly as chairman of the Government Operations Committee, he has made immensely significant contributions to American Government. As a result of his successful labors, our Government has become more effective, and efficient in innumerable ways.

Having served with him for 22 years, I know, admire, and respect him far beyond the limited powers of words to describe.

Under his direction, legislation was developed and enacted into law creating several new Federal energy organizations. These include the Federal Energy Administration, Energy Research and Development Administration, a Nuclear Regulatory Commission, and an Energy Resources Council. He authored the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act, which created the General Services Administration, to give central direction to Government procurement and property management. Later, he developed legislation for a comprehensive, systematic review of Government procurement practices; the Commission on Government Procurement.

As a result of his initiatives, procedures have been simplified to expedite smaller Federal purchases, saving taxpayers $100 million annually. He is responsible for establishing the Office of Federal Procurement Policy, carrying with it potential savings to taxpayers of billions of dollars.

Without his efforts, we would have not obtained improved amendments to the Freedom of Information Act. Under his chairmanship, the Federal Advisory Committee Act was enacted, requiring Federal advisory committees to be publicly identified and minutes of their proceedings be made publicly available. As a result the public is entitled to know who advises Government and how much advice is given. CHET's work on legislation to insure an individual's rights of privacy in handling Government records is another landmark in civil liberties legislation. This alone is a monument to his legislative record.

His work on the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy on which he has served since its inception in 1946, is an outstanding accomplishment in and of itself. He has always insisted on civilian control of the atom, vigorous research into its peaceful uses and international agreements aimed at bringing benefits to all mankind.

In addition to serving on the Hoover Commission, he managed legislation creating two Cabinet-level departments; Transportation and Housing and Urban Development.

CHET's awards are as numerous as his accomplishments. These include three honorary degrees; the coveted Congressional Distinguished Service Awards of the American Political Science Association and the Henry DeWolf Smyth Nuclear Statesman Award.

Throughout his career he has battled for civil liberties and civil rights with courage, consistency, and energy. Among his many successful endeavors in this field was authorship of the bill establishing the Cabinet Committee on Opportunities for the Spanish-speaking people within the Office of the President.

It would be a simple matter to list more such accomplishments on behalf of our country, and to continue indefinitely without exhausting his credits.

Yet, it is CHET's personal qualities which have enabled him to do so much on behalf of us all. We all are aware of his warmth, compassion and dedication to public service. His personal character has been noted by everyone in this House. His private life has always been exemplary; we all know him to be an ideal husband, father, grandfather, and great-grandfather.

I know that as he and his lovely wife, Cam, leave us for what I know will be a long and fruitful retirement, they will know they carry with them the deepest affection and respect of every Member of this House and of every American. We are all the richer for his efforts and all the poorer for his retirement.

ANDREY AVINOFF, ARTIST

HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, in the last decade we have seen greater official recognition of art and art forms and the individual contributions of native born and naturalized American artists.

A good friend and a patron of the arts in Pittsburgh, George R. Hann, has called my attention to the credo of one such artist—the late Dr. Andrey Avinoff—who came to the United States from the Soviet Union in 1917 and whose work has been widely acclaimed. For the benefit of those who admired Dr. Avinoff's painting, as well as others in the art world, I am glad to include his credo herewith:

December 20, 1974

ANDREY AVINOFF: HIS ARTISTIC CREDO

Ever since I can remember I have loved drawing and painting. At the age of four years I drew a mountainous landscape, the like of which I have not since equalled, if the satisfaction and pride which I felt at that time are to be accepted as criterions. The quite startling understanding of distance and significance which those receding mountain peaks, each topped by a fine eagle, gave to me was one of the important experiences in my, until then, level existence. This proved to be but a first happening, in a chain of adventures, which seem to have put me in direct contact with an unexpected variety of artistic sources. Many of the unaccountable incidents and vicissitudes, which came to me in subsequent years, had no apparent connection with art, and yet from them I have been permitted to build a deliberate and not unfounded point of view, which, taken together with a conscientious attempt to secure technical freedom, have resulted in my present attitude towards aesthetics and towards art. It is the contact with many cycles and sources which leads me to believe in the desirability of a diversity of style, by which the artist may more fully reflect his own impulse and his understanding of the tendencies characterizing various artistic traditions.

I always consider butterflies as my main instructors in Art. Since childhood I have made paintings of them, endeavoring to reproduce every shade of their color, and every minute detail of pattern. Naturally, my eye has been trained to notice the slightest variations in this respect. The question of ornamental value of the butterfly's wings attracted me as one of the most fascinating problems connected with my favorite branch of entomology. Together with systematic and biological investigations, I regard as most instructive the study of the laws of color and the pattern variations and interconnections exhibited by the butterfly wings, which after all, represent the unique phenomenon in nature of a rigid, flat and ornamented surface, stretched onto veins. This surface is devoid of any marked structural irregularity. The study of each pattern infinitely varies though manifestly subject to certain laws of balance, symmetry, ornamental repetitions in the very intricate striation, peculiar ocellation and elaborate border designs—and discloses wonderfully illuminating material on decoration as pure crystallization of natural ornament, independent of any epoch or national taste. Perhaps one of the most instructive features of the coloring of butterflies' and moths' wings, is not so much how the colors are matched, as in what proportion of relative areas, equal or interrupted, they are combined. The elements of quality and quantity are here equally significant. One can find, on these winged jewels, examples of dynamic symmetries, "constructivisms," "suprematism," so much spoken about now-a-days, and a great deal more besides, never dreamed by any modernist-prophet.

I decidedly consider a close and thoroughly systematic study of color rotations and pattern variations of lepidoptera, most valuable guide for developing a sense of color composition and a feeling for harmonious and natural ornamentation.

Besides the scientific interest and gratification which I derived from entomology, I feel myself immeasurably indebted in my work as an artist, to the winged creatures that received from the ancient Greeks the fitting name of Psyche.

Voyaging about the world brought me in contact again, at a mature age, with the magic and charm of Asiatic art. It was a true inspiration to admire the glories of India—Buddhist, Hindu and Mahometan—the phantasmagorical temples of South India, the grace and abstract perfection of Mogul art, the fascinating mystery and profound symbolism of Tibetan banners in remote lamaseries. I am inclined equally to treasure the enigmatic, terse laconism of the early Chinese portrait painters, the calligraphic refinement of a court painter of a Shah-Takmasp or a Shah-Jehan, or the devout pictorial prayer of a nameless monk in a forgotten monastery.

The tropical lands in the Old and New Worlds—Ceylon; later, the West Indies, have disclosed the wonders of colors in exuberant vegetation that transcend all regular limits of landscape composition in temperate zones.

The primitive art of modern natives presents an interesting tribute of naive interpretation of the luxury and overwhelming power of surrounding Nature.

Having come in touch with a great variety of artistic traditions, during my travels around the World, I always experience a delight in plunging into different cycles of beauty conception, and now I feel that my inclinations are decidedly divided between different schools, even different cultures.

Perhaps these tendencies may seem paradoxical, but for me they preserve the intimate interconnection, like different sounds forming one chord. It would be difficult to express, briefly and explicitly, my artistic credo from the point of view of my sympathies with accepted and known schools, but its closest formula would include early Italian and Flemish Renaissance of scarcely later than the Quattro Cento, ancient Russian Ikon Paintings and Indo-Persian miniatures. The early Tibetan art also commands, in a way, my very great admiration. The Archaic Greek art conception has a great fascination for me. In the modern schools, which leave me cold in comparison with the magnificent achievement of a more spiritual past, I am interested naively in some novel ways of treating luminosities, spectral problems, transparencies and superimposed prismatic reflections, so frequent on the iridescent butterfly wings.

A loyalty to artistic traditions, a feeling of appropriateness of various forms and style to particular subjects, and a knowledge of draftsmanship are the best assets, in my opinion, to a free personal expression. Moods, prompted by certain pictorial problems, should freely and easily dictate the corresponding form of expression, blending them out of their sympathetic components and molding them into one indivisible entity.

It is like the perfect knowledge of all the shades of meanings of words, the understanding of rules of correct phrase construction and the feeling for character in language, that permits us to use it to the best advantage in expressing our innermost personality. An artist, in order to be free, should worship craftsmanship and should lovingly cultivate the vehicle of his expression in all the varied forms of his fancy.

With all due respect to the correctness of drawing in cases of realistic painting, I feel more and more a call toward symbolical, allegorical paintings. The grand visions, contained in many sacred scriptures, are a source of the most inspiring admiration, and, if I will be able to dedicate myself to the pictorial interpretation of some of these in the modest limits of my ability, I would consider my vocation fulfilled.

Art is an aesthetic conception or emotion expressed by creative imagination in terms of intelligible, competent and appropriate forms. Speaking of visual and representative arts only, one may say that art is essentially transfiguration. The magic wand of imagination may barely touch the world of realities or transmute it into a dreamlike vision, but it remains the core of the creative process nevertheless. No closer formula could readily be given, except, that one thing remains intolerable—that blend of arrogance and ignorance which parades so often as "art" in our confused days.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

The image, as reflected in the Icon, is a demonstration of an immutable order and a spiritual hierarchy of ideas. . . . The brilliancy of the colors signifies blissful emancipation, a supreme freedom associated with restrained tonalities and lines of suffering and grief—indeed, suffering and joy are not far apart in the Icon, as in the fabulous twin birds of Mirth and Lamentation in the popular Russian imagery. One of the aspects of the immobility of the figures is expounding a state religious exaltation with the intensity of a glow concentrated merely in the expression of the eyes. The translation to a higher plane is completely fulfilled in the gaze, while the body remains motionless, as if it were gripped by an ecstatic trance. . . . As a general rule, obvious signs of excitement and of violent emotions are relegated to the representation of a state of mankind that has not reached ultimate illumination and which is still incapable of beholding a surpassing vision. . . . To obtain a proper evaluation of this ideology and meaning, the peculiarities and aims of the Icon should be understood as a visual reverberation of transcendental realm. The Icon was never concerned with a record of reality but always strove to reflect a transfigured world.

Art is altogether a species of inspired elimination. An etching is a cobweb of black lines precariously projected over the vacuity of blank white paper, a graphic gossamer spread over a predominating negation. What would music sound like if there were neither pauses nor intervals, no beneficial moments of silence and recuperation. . . . Modern music is often grown over-efficient, filling all inter-spaces, promulgating a disquieting and deafening "horror of the void".

Painting in watercolor is "food control". It is the art of turning an inundation into chromatic form, an accident into achievement. The aquarellist, like a fairy godfather, presides with his brush over the birth of a juicy splash which may or should turn into a constricted ramification of pigment—mechanical in its two-dimensional crystallization but still mysterious and yet controlled: A demonstrable truth of the work of the accidental principle in our relatively orderly but essentially unpredictable universe! Like a phrase is built of a concatenation and parallel superposition of ideas of varying volume as expressed in words, so also an articulate watercolor painting is a concatenation and superposition of chromatic semantics. Water, like a true catalyst, binds and marries the tints and then disappears altogether—a marrying person who effects the union and does not count any more in the subsequent life of the couple; all important at the start and "spurious" at the end. . . .

Born under the Zodiacal sign of Aquarius, the aquarellist is predestined to a career of sensitiveness. Never reaching the orchestral "Tutti" of oil paintings, it possesses all the inimitable charm of chamber music. Symphonic storming of the heavens may not be its lot, but the mystery of pigmental confluences and translucencies is fully in its domain. But in order not to be submerged by the hazards of water, the aquarellist should rely on the life belt of his experience and the fancy strokes of his intuition. Watercolor and legitimate spontaneity are almost synonymous, but a life-long experience should be behind it.

Painting should remain a sign—it is by its very nature a symbol. It should be, in its true achievement, a relation of significances—an apocalypse in colors and forms. Mathematical harmonies and musical laws are akin to it. The metaphysical is within its reach. The styles are part of the form and thus are an intrinsic element of the subject, since to disclose it in a visual, graphical or chromatic form is the purpose of painting.

Our ecstasies, before the multifarious glories of the beautiful, are anchored in an intuitive consciousness of a supreme unity. The work of an artist should be a sacrifice of devotion and a tribute of admiration to the Creator, as a dewdrop reflects the Sun and shines with a small spark of a heavenly rainbow.

HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, HAROLD DONOHUE and I came to the Congress together in January 1947 as freshman Members of the 80th Congress. Since then I have countless times relied on his friendship and wise counsel. As the ranking member of the House Judiciary Committee the Nation owes HAROLD DONOHUE a debt of gratitude for the dignified and effective manner in which he served. He will be greatly missed here in the Congress by countless friends. Mr. Speaker, as HAROLD DONOHUE leaves the Congress we want to extend to him our very best wishes for health and happiness and the best always.

REPROCESSING OF NUCLEAR FUELS

HON. ORVAL HANSEN

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. HANSEN of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an excellent address delivered by Mr. James A. Buckham, assistant general manager of the Idaho Chemical Programs Office of the Allied Chemical Corp., on the occasion of his receiving the Robert E. Wilson Award in Nuclear Chemical Engineering from the American Institute of Chemical Engineers.

In the continuing dialog on the use of nuclear energy to bridge the U.S. energy gap, much attention has been focused on the disposal of radioactive material resulting from the operation of nuclear reactors, including spent nuclear reactor fuel. Mr. Buckham has thoughtfully analyzed the economic and environmental advantages of reprocessing nuclear fuels. I am sure his assessment on the feasibility, and indeed, the necessity, of nuclear fuel recycling will be of great value—both to the Nation's scientific community and to those charged with formulating policies regarding spent nuclear fuel. The text of Mr. Buckham's address follows:

WHY REPROCESS NUCLEAR FUELS?

(By James A. Buckham)

Recycling of unused fissionable material through reprocessing of spent nuclear reactor fuel has been planned since nuclear power was first conceived. Yet, today we ask why. I will cover why we must do it, rather than why bother to do it. Today, some are questioning this step in the fuel cycle, suggesting that entire spent fuel elements be regarded as high-level waste and placed in a Federal Repository without reprocessing. However, my overall analysis shows that fuel reprocessing remains, today, superior to direct disposal of spent fuel in terms of economics, material conservation, and environmental protection, and that this step must be retained and the fuel "cycle" must be completed.

December 20, 1974

There are seven basic reasons why spent fuel reprocessing should be performed. Two of these relate primarily to the superiority of fuel reprocessing as a waste management step, and five of them relate primarily to energy and resource recovery. These reasons are discussed in the following paragraphs, in that order.

1. Better Waste Management: Ignoring, for the moment, any economic or conservation advantages stemming from recovery and recycle of fissionable and other materials, a fuel reprocessing plant can be regarded as a solid waste treatment facility in which the large volume of spent reactor fuel is converted to smaller volumes of high-level solid waste having superior characteristics for long-term storage and disposal.

First, considering the conversion in a fuel reprocessing facility of over 99 percent of the fission products to a compact solid waste such as calcine, ceramic, or glass, a considerable volume reduction is achieved. Based on pilot-plant data from current tests sponsored by the AEC's Division of Waste Management and Transportation at the Idaho Chemical Processing Plant, the volume of high-level calcined waste from a typical LWR fuel is about one cubic foot per tonne of fuel. If this high-level waste is then converted to a ceramic or a glass, the volume will probably remain under two cubic feet per tonne. These figures should be compared to the core volume of some 14 cubic feet per tonne for a typical LWR. Thus, the high-level waste is converted, through reprocessing, to some 1/7 to 1/14 the volume of the core. If the core were to be sent directly to a Federal Waste Repository, undoubtedly additional volume would be added through canning or other treatment.

The expected high costs of disposal of these high-level wastes have not yet been announced; but, in all likelihood, they will be highly dependent on volume and unit heat generation, and as a first approximation one should be able to assume that these costs are reduced by at least a factor of ten through reprocessing. The cost savings in Federal Repository costs alone, together with the environmental advantages of having placed the fission products in a more durable form, should justify the fuel reprocessing step.

There are, of course, other solid wastes stemming from a fuel reprocessing operation. These include cladding hulls; adsorbed iodine; ash from incineration of paper, rags, and plastic; and miscellaneous partly contaminated equipment and materials. Taken together, the volume of these wastes will exceed several-fold that of the high-level wastes, but the unit cost of ultimate disposal should be much lower since these wastes do not require external cooling, and most require only minimal shielding for transport and handling. Therefore, it is extremely unlikely that the total cost of permanent management of wastes from a fuel reprocessing plant would even approach that of direct disposal of spent cores as waste, even if we restrict our thinking to currently developed technology.

2. Possibility for Improved Waste Management: If one were to dispose of entire spent cores as waste, little or no option for safer or lower-cost practices would be available. Only by proceeding with fuel reprocessing are improvements in the safety and cost of waste management possible. The particular aspect of improved waste management practice that appeals to me is segregation of wastes according to their relative hazard. It is especially appealing to recycle all plutonium and other transuranic elements to reactors where they are fissioned or transmuted to shorter-lived elements. This would reduce the duration of hazard to a thousand years instead of hundreds of thousands of years and eliminate geological uncertainties from concern in waste management.

Admittedly, studies to date indicate a high cost for total removal of transuranic elements from wastes, but additional research may lead to significant advances in technology and significant cost reduction. As an example, research undertaken a little over a year ago at the Idaho Chemical Processing Plant is showing considerable promise for reducing, at modest cost, the transuranic element content of calcined high-level wastes from that facility to below the currently defined transuranic-free level of 10 nanocuries per gram. It is possible that further studies may make such an achievement generally applicable; but, without fuel reprocessing, the plutonium would have to remain entirely in the spent fuel placed in the Federal Repository.

Other improvements in high-level waste management are also possible. These include isolation and special treatment of the two biologically most significant fission product hazards, strontium-90 and cesium-137. Some efforts have been made in this direction, and certainly more progress is possible; but fuel reprocessing is a necessary prerequisite.

Optimum forms of other wastes from fuel reprocessing operations have undoubtedly not yet been identified. Based on current technology, front-runners are: canned immobilized ash from combustibles; compacted and canned hulls, equipment, and other non-combustible solids; and iodine sorbed on lead and silver zeolites. By continuing to perform fuel reprocessing, it is very likely that less costly, safe methods of managing each of these types of wastes can be developed, which would improve even further the advantages of a fuel reprocessing plant as a waste treatment facility.

Thus far, the fuel reprocessing operation has been discussed as a waste treatment facility, and its superiority over direct disposal of spent fuel has been addressed. Next, let us examine the five resource-oriented advantages of fuel reprocessing. For this discussion I would like to take as a unit of measure, the current "standard sized" fuel reprocessing plant of 1500 tonnes per year.

3. Recycle of Plutonium: This advantage has already been treated briefly from the waste management standpoint, in that the clearly superior treatment of plutonium in spent fuel is to place it back in a nuclear reactor where it is eventually destroyed, thus avoiding a 250,000-year potential hazard. Much has been said about plutonium recycle, but it is not yet being done, except on a limited experimental basis. A draft of a generic environmental statement on this subject has been issued by the AEC which shows the overall desirability of recycle. A prompt favorable decision is needed to permit this step to proceed without further delay.

Contrary to some statements, the hazards from recycled plutonium in LWRs are not significantly different from those in current operations of LWRs. Today, just before fuel discharge, most of the fissions occurring in LWRs are coming from plutonium which was converted from uranium-238 in the fuel. The final plutonium loading in LWRs with plutonium recycle will be less than twice those present in today's operations. Such a small change would not be significant in the safety analysis of reactor operation, spent fuel handling, or fuel reprocessing. The only places where the environmental protection aspects are clearly changed are in the fuel fabrication, new fuel shipping, and fuel loading operations. These operations, however, can clearly cope with the presence of plutonium in a safe manner as described in the AEC's generic environmental statement.

What of the resource conservation achieved by this recycle? In a typical reprocessing plant for LWR fuels, some 6 kilograms of fissionable plutonium are recovered per tonne of fuel. At $15 per gram, a conservative value, the value of this material is $135 million per year for each 1500-tonne-per-year plant. In other terms, this recycle will extend the uranium ore reserves and uranium enrichment capability of the nation by some 15 to 20 percent, saving the mining of over a million tons of ore annually. This is indeed a very meaningful fiscal and resource conservation benefit accompanying the most prudent waste management practice possible for plutonium.

4. Recovery of Unused Uranium: The other primary product of fuel reprocessing, uranium, is also of significant resource value. Typically, the uranium-235 content of the residual uranium in spent LWR fuel is over 0.8%—somewhat above that of natural uranium. The return of this uranium to enrichment and fuel fabrication channels has an added value of some $100 million per year for a 1500-tonne-per-year plant and extends the enrichment capacity and uranium ore reserves of the country approximately another 15 percent. Again, nearly a million tons of ore mining are saved annually by this recycle.

5. Permits Development of Breeder Reactors: The nuclear industry has for years been aiming at the development of breeder reactors in which more fissionable material is created than is burned up. This development, when fully implemented, will extend the usage of known supplies of nuclear fuel into the thousands years, virtually assuring the country of adequate energy for a sufficient length of time to develop alternate sources. Plutonium recycled from reprocessing of LWR fuels is needed to start a viable breeder reactor industry. More importantly, in the long term, it serves no purpose to breed fissionable materials that cannot be used, and spent fuel reprocessing is a mandatory step in recovery of the bred material.

6. Permits Use of Thorium Ore: Thorium is much more abundant in nature than uranium, and thorium can be converted to fissionable uranium-233 in a nuclear power reactor. One type of reactor currently using thorium fuel for conversion to uranium-233 is the High Temperature Gas-Cooled Reactor (HTGR). This reactor system shows considerable promise, but, again, the whole concept hinges on reprocessing spent fuel for recovery and recycle of the uranium-233.

7. Makes Fission Product Utilization Possible: Throughout the nuclear age, beneficial usage of fission products has been a dream of many. I am not an advocate of widespread usage of radioactive fission products as heat or power sources; this is contrary to sound waste management practice. However, special uses of radioactive fission products under license with adequate controls are certainly proper, and, in many cases, this provides the only satisfactory solution to a special need.

There is another aspect to this subject that could well be of far greater significance—namely, the recovery of nonradioactive rare substances from the fission product and daughter mixtures. Two such substances are xenon and rhodium, both of which are available from a mature nuclear power industry in quantities greatly in excess of those available naturally. Xenon could be used as the gas in truly long-lived light bulbs and has been under study as an anesthetic. Rhodium is a rare platinum metal with at least ornamental, catalytic, and corrosion-resistant uses similar to those of its sister elements. Probably the most important uses of these or other rare elements in the fission product mixtures have yet to be discovered. In any event, spent fuel reprocessing is a necessary prerequisite in any future beneficial usage of these rare elements.

For the preceding seven reasons, spent fuel reprocessing is believed to be a vital and necessary part of the nuclear power industry, serving not only as a needed radioactive waste treatment facility, but also to recycle valuable materials that will greatly extend the world's supply of nuclear fuels, or conserve other fuels. In this latter context, it is interesting to note that the products of a single 1500-tonne-per-year fuel reprocessing plant are equivalent to about 300 million barrels of crude oil annually and, in today's situation, represent a saving in our balance-of-payments deficit of about three billion dollars a year. Under these circumstances, one would expect that such a vital industry would be well established, healthy, and fully prepared to meet future needs. Unfortunately, this is not the case. In fact, due to the slow establishment by the U.S. Government of all the licensing requirements for this industry and to the high capital cost requirements, this industry is dangerously close to being unable to meet future demands. Let's look briefly at the current situation.

Production reactor fuels, research and test reactor fuels, and Naval propulsion fuels have been satisfactorily reprocessed at AEC plants at Hanford, Savannah River, and Idaho for over 20 years, as well as in several overseas plants, although the final proper disposition of radioactive wastes from these operations is not yet completed. But, very little reprocessing of commercial light-water power reactor fuels has been accomplished. In fact, in the free world, only three plants have done any such reprocessing, and all three are currently shut down. These are the Eurochemic Plant in Belgium, the Windscale Plant in the United Kingdom, and the Nuclear Fuels Services Plant in western New York state. The total throughput of commercial fuel at these three plants, however, has been less than 600 tonnes—over half of which was processed overseas. This is the equivalent of only four months of operation of a "standard" 1500-tonne-per-year plant.

But, what of our capability for future commercial nuclear fuel reprocessing? The Nuclear Fuels Services Plant was shut down in 1972 to improve its environmental protection features and to expand its capacity from 300 to 750 tonnes per year. Assuming that present plans materialize, this facility could be back in operation in 1979 and able to handle, thereafter, the spent fuel from some 30 nuclear reactors.

The General Electric Company built and started testing a 300-tonne-per-year plant at Morris, Illinois, of unique and semi-experimental design. However, in July 1974, General Electric advised the AEC that, having spent some $64 million, it would cost an additional $90 to $130 million and take an additional four years to make the substantial modifications needed to make this plant operable. In effect, General Electric has withdrawn from the nuclear fuel reprocessing market, at least for the present.

The only hope for near-term reprocessing of spent commercial power reactor fuels in the United States is at the 1500-tonne-per-year plant being constructed near Barnwell, South Carolina, by Allied-General Nuclear Services (AGNS), a partnership of Allied Chemical and General Atomic Company. This plant is now some 80 percent complete and is scheduled for startup in July, 1978. The Barnwell plant could serve the needs of some 60 nuclear reactors when fully operational.

While successful operation of the Barnwell plant on a timely basis is necessary to prevent a serious bottleneck in the nuclear power industry, this plant alone will not be able to keep up with even the lowest forecasts of power reactor fuel unloadings. The possibility of having no place to put such spent fuel is becoming very real.

Only one other company, Exxon Nuclear, has even announced its interest in building a nuclear fuel reprocessing plant for spent commercial power reactor fuels. It is estimated that some 9 to 10 years would be required to build such a plant, so the earliest availability date for the Exxon plant or any other new plant would appear to be 1984. Yet, by 1980, the most optimistic estimate of commercial fuel processing cumulative capacity in this country will be 8000 tonnes, whereas the estimated cumulative requirements by that date will be about 10,000 tonnes—a shortfall of some 2000 tonnes. Unless additional new plant construction is started soon, this shortfall will increase rapidly in the succeeding decade.

With a clear demand for their services and with such a vital role to play in the nuclear industry, for the foreseeable future, why aren't many companies scrambling to start building new plants? There are two identifiable reasons: First, policies and licensing requirements for such plants in the areas of waste management and plutonium recycle have not yet been established. Second, a substantial corporate investment is required with a very delayed recovery of such an investment. The AGNS plant is expected to cost some $500 million by the time it is completed, and future similarly sized plants will likely incur capital costs approaching a billion dollars due to recent and predicted cost increases for this type of equipment and facility.

Prompt and satisfactory resolution of the problems in both of these areas is needed so that nuclear power can fulfill its promise of providing substantial relief from the energy shortage during the balance of this century. Then, we will not have to ask again, "Why Reprocess Nuclear Fuels?", but instead can ask the more meaningful questions: "Who Will Reprocess Nuclear Fuels?" and "Where and When Will They Do It?"

"A PROGRAM OF ACTION FOR PEOPLE"

HON. BELLA S. ABZUG

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Ms. ABZUG. Mr. Speaker, a very significant Program of Action for People was unanimously approved by the leadership of Region 9, United Auto Workers at a meeting in Rochester, N.Y., November 10, 1974.

Pointing out that "we are drifting from a serious recession toward a dreaded depression," the New York State UAW outlined a series of legislative remedies with which I am in agreement.

If the proposals made by the UAW are enacted by the 94th Congress, as I hope they will be, we will as a nation have taken the essential steps in reordering our priorities to make our distribution of the Nation's resources more equitable and to improve the living conditions of all the American people.

The UAW statement follows:

A PROGRAM OF ACTION FOR PEOPLE

To: Labor union, municipal representatives, State and Federal representatives, and concerned citizens.

Unemployment in October 1974, is variously at 6½ to 12% of the labor force. But millions are not counted. Persons over forty-five, women, young blacks, members of other minority groups and others who have become discouraged in their search for work are no longer counted as being unemployed. Nor does the official statistic include thousands of others who work less than full time, but would like full time jobs. The actual number of the unemployed may be double the official figure.

All indications are that the situation will get worse. Each day brings reports of new layoffs in auto, glass, rubber, steel, electrical, and the soft goods industries. Almost half the workers in the construction industry are now unemployed. And now, we learn that many governmental bodies, faced with inflation and declining tax revenues, are imposing job freezes and making layoffs of civil service workers whose employment was presumably guaranteed.

Most public employees are not covered by unemployment insurance and the loss of their jobs frequently means an immediate transfer to the welfare rolls. Statistics reveal that a majority of all unemployed workers do not collect unemployment insurance during layoff and those who collect, receive on the average, less than half their normal pay. UAW members, generally believed to be better protected, are finding that "S.U.B. Funds" intended to supplement unemployment insurance checks are being rapidly depleted and will not long provide protection against the massive layoffs now taking place.

As layoffs mount and the recession deepens, the cost of living continues to skyrocket. The last twelve months have showed a 12.2% jump in the Consumer Price Index. The prices for automobiles, homes, appliances and food are out of sight. But not all Americans are suffering from inflation.

Most large companies are making more money than ever before. The oil companies are enjoying windfall profits. These same companies are now involved in a major campaign to deregulate natural gas. This campaign, if successful, will transfer billions more from the pockets of consumers to the pockets of the oil producers.

Banks are lending less but making more. New car loans are being offered for four years at rates of 12 to 20%. Home loans of $30,000 at 12% for a thirty year period finally return to the bank a total of $111,080.

A handful of agri-business companies now dominate the food growing, processing and marketing industry. As a result, prices increase daily at the supermarkets, profits skyrocket for the food companies, farmers' income goes down and old people are forced to eat pet food.

The groups affected most adversely by the economic crisis are the young and the old. Older persons operating on fixed incomes stretch their meager incomes still further. One third of all cat and dog food is now reportedly sold to older people. Job opportunities for the young also vanish and, frequently, so do educational opportunities. Educational institutions are generally among the first to feel the crush of inflation and reduced incomes.

Inflation has been most visible in the provision of health care services. Doctors' fees, hospital costs, and rates for nursing homes and auxiliary services have risen more rapidly in more recent years than in any other sector of the economy. Despite the fact that Americans are spending more on health care, a larger percentage of the total population is unable to obtain adequate health care than ever before.

This is the crisis of America in the year 1974. In January a new Congress will convene. Many members of that Congress have indicated a concern with the economic crisis confronting the nation. Congress must be encouraged to act quickly and decisively.

Labor unions, governmental bodies, and concerned citizens should join in memorializing Congress to:

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

December 20, 1974

1. Implement the Full Employment Act of 1946 by providing public service employment at decent wages for every able-bodied citizen wanting work on projects that will make improvements in the communities and areas where they work and live.
2. Provide for increased unemployment benefits for not less than one year and not less than 75% of the average weekly wage, and provide also national eligibility standards for all states so that workers made idle by the recession do not end up hungry or on welfare rolls.
3. Take action to bring about a reduction in interest rates through low interest loans that will make possible the purchase of homes, automobiles, appliances, etc., and assure the re-employment of millions of American workers. Sponsor a broad national housing program aimed at making good housing at reasonable costs available to all American families.
4. Pass legislation to curb run-away plants to low wage southern and rural areas or to foreign countries, and protect the jobs of American workers from unfair competition to the maximum extent possible.
5. Roll back the prices of gasoline, fuel oil, sugar and other commodities where price gains and profiteering have been responsible for outlandish prices, and enact legislation to provide for effective governmental regulation of mammoth domestic and multinational corporations so as to prevent manipulation of the economy through contrived shortages and fantastic price increases.
6. Enact a national program of aid to education that will keep students in school, teachers at work and relieve states, municipalities and educational institutions of some of the enormous burdens with which they are now confronted.
7. Enact a national program of health insurance that will guarantee good health care to every American as a matter of right.
8. Improve Social Security benefits to allow for the enormous increase in the cost of living in recent months, and increase the ceiling of permissible earnings before loss of benefits to at least $5,000 per year.
9. Close the tax loopholes which have enabled U.S. Corporations and multi-nationals to escape their fair share of taxation. Provide further for a minimum income tax that must be paid by the millionaires of the country regardless of whether their income derives from dividends, capital gains, stock market speculation, or any other source.
10. Finally, Congress must act to cut all the fat and waste out of the $91 billion Pentagon budget, establish effective and meaningful Congressional control over the Pentagon, and to terminate aid to the corrupt President Thieu in Viet Nam, and to other military dictatorships we have been supporting around the world.

Passed unanimously by the New York State Leadership of the U.A.W. in session Tuesday, December 10, 1974, Rochester, New York.

INDIANS CLAIMS COMMISSION

HON. ORVAL HANSEN

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. HANSEN of Idaho, Mr. Speaker, Congress has been long aware of the many injustices that occurred during the acquisition of Indian lands, and acted to correct these inequities by establishing an Indian Claims Commission in 1946 and voting in subsequent years to rectify inadequate treaty payments.

While many historical abuses have been ameliorated by the Indian Claims Commission, the claim of the Boise and Bruneau Shoshone Indians of Idaho has suffered from benign neglect for over a century.

A review of the historical record in this case indicates that corrective action is long overdue. The original treaty negotiated between the Boise Shoshone Indian Nation and the Governor of Idaho, representing the United States of America, was signed on October 10, 1864, and on April 10, 1866, the Governor of Idaho and the Bruneau Shoshone signed a similar treaty. However, after more than a century, the U.S. Senate has still not ratified these treaties. And, to add insult to injury, the Boise and Bruneau Shoshone have never been compensated for the lands they relinquished in southwestern Idaho. I hope that the 94th Congress will address this matter and settle this longstanding obligation to the people of the Boise and Bruneau Shoshone Indian Nation.

For the benefit of my colleagues, I include at this point in my remarks a joint memorial of the Boise and Bruneau Bands of the Shoshone Indians to the U.S. Congress, and a background paper on this matter prepared by the Idaho Historical Society:

JOINT MEMORIAL OF THE BOISE AND BRUNEAU BANDS OF THE SHOSHONE INDIANS TO THE U.S. CONGRESS

Assembled in council at Boise, Idaho, October 25, 1974, the Boise and Bruneau Shoshone respectfully represent that—

1. On October 10, 1864, the governor of Idaho, representing the United States of America as superintendent of Indian affairs for Idaho, and the Boise Shoshone Indian Nation signed the Treaty of Fort Boise, providing for cession to the United States of Boise valley and surrounding lands thirty miles on each side of the river.
2. On April 10, 1866, the governor of Idaho and the Bruneau Shoshone Nation concluded and signed a similar treaty providing for cession of the Owyhee mines and certain Snake and Bruneau river valley lands to the United States.
3. After more than a century, the United States Senate has not gotten around to ratifying these treaties.
4. The United States of America still has not obtained Indian title to the Boise and Bruneau lands of southwestern Idaho, although Caleb Lyon of Lyonsdale, governor and superintendent of Indian affairs for Idaho, solemnly promised us that this matter would be attended to.

Therefore, we urge that the Idaho congressional delegation take whatever action may be necessary to correct this long standing injustice.

THE BOISE CLAIM

In a belated effort to correct injustices arising during the acquisition of Indian lands, Congress established an Indian claims commission in 1946. This agency has been reviewing cases involving Indian lands for more than a quarter century. Complaints that the Indians had been dealt with unfairly had reached Congress for many years. Treaty payments for Indian lands often had failed to approach values normally paid by whites. Since the Indians generally did not buy or sell land at all, until they were forced to sell to the whites, bargaining over land values had made little or no sense to them. While they generally might have preferred to have their lands back, the Indians have been busy since 1946 in bringing actions to recover the amounts they should have been paid a century or more ago when their lands were taken from them. The entire operation has been decidedly unusual. But to satisfy awards determined by the Indian Claims Commission, Congress has voted millions of dollars to rectify inadequate treaty payments made long ago.

In the case of the Boise and the Bruneau Shoshoni, the United States never got around to paying anything at all for the Indian lands of southwestern Idaho. In the treaty of Fort Boise, October 10, 1864, the Boise Shoshoni agreed to relinquish Boise valley, Boise Basin, and some adjacent lands for an undetermined sum. Governor Caleb Lyon of Lyonsdale, a newcomer to Idaho who did not pretend to know how much Congress might be willing to pay, signed the treaty with the understanding that some knowledgeable official in Washington, D.C. would fill in an appropriate amount. So far, no one has bothered to figure out the amount, and the United States Senate never has managed to ratify the treaty. Because of these delinquencies, no payment has been made on some of the most valuable of Idaho's Indian lands. So far as the record shows, they still belong to the Indians.

Caleb Lyon also signed a treaty with the Bruneau Shoshoni, April 10, 1866, in order to obtain the important Owyhee mining region around Silver City. Much of the extensive Bruneau holdings were designated for a reservation. But some of their lands near Snake river also were to be ceded to the whites. When Governor Lyon returned to Boise with his Bruneau treaty, he found that he had been dismissed from office because of his unpopular Indian policy. His successor, David W. Ballard, had no way of finding out the terms of Lyon's treaties, and the Senate never considered ratifying the Bruneau treaty either.

Under substantial pressure to get the Boise Shoshoni removed to a reservation—hopefully as far away as possible—Governor Ballard did not attempt to negotiate any more treaties. He arranged instead to have President Andrew Johnson establish a reservation at Fort Hall for the Boise Shoshoni, July 14, 1867. A large area there was set aside as the Fort Hall reservation, and in a conference at Long Tom, August 26, 1867, Governor Ballard reached a formal agreement with Tagi and the Bannock (and presumably the Fort Hall Shoshoni) that they would settle on the new Fort Hall reservation by June 1, 1868.

An independent effort on the part of the Indian Peace Commission to deal with the Eastern Shoshoni, as well as with the Fort Hall Shoshoni and Bannock, threatened to upset Ballard's arrangement with Tagi and his associates. Responding to a request from the Peace Commission, Tagi and 800 of his people assembled at Fort Bridger on May 15, 1868, for another conference. After a long delay, representatives from the United States discussed the reservation issue with the Indians. The eastern Shoshoni, quite reasonably, wanted their reservation on Wind river east of the continental divide. At this point, the Bannock and Fort Hall Shoshoni were asked to settle on Wind river also. Since a perfectly good reservation already had been established for the Boise Shoshoni around Fort Hall—the homeland of the Bannock and Fort Hall Shoshoni—Tagi refused this stupid suggestion. He already had agreed to remain at Fort Hall on a reservation where he belonged. Sending the Boise Shoshoni to Fort Hall and the Fort Hall Shoshoni and Bannock to Wind river made no sense at all. Finally Tagi and his people were allowed, by the treaty of Fort Bridger, July 3, 1868, to

FUTURE POWER NEEDS OF THE CONSUMER

HON. WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. DORN, Mr. Speaker, it is in the interest of the electric power consumer that adequate power be available 10 years from now, 20 years, even the year 2000. The only way to assure electricity for the future consumer is for the utility companies to plan and build generating capacity now. The electric power industry cannot expand to meet that future need unless capital is available.

The answer, Mr. Speaker, is not nationalization of the power industry. Socialism is not the answer. This would only lead to poor service for the consumer, blackouts, and higher rates. This is the story of nationalization and excessive government regulation the world over. The private power industry must be permitted a reasonable profit in order to expand and provide power for the consumer of tomorrow.

During recent months most utility companies have had to increase their rates and a number of customers have expressed dissatisfaction that their electric bills have gone up so much during a relatively short period of time. Mr. Carl Horn, the dynamic, progressive, and able president of Duke Power Co., has brought to my attention some extremely important facts related to the overall problem that will be of interest to my colleagues and the American people. According to Mr. Horn, these are the principal reasons for his company's recent rate increases:

First. The company's largest single item of operating expense is cost of fuel used to generate electricity, mostly coal. In 1970 the company's fuel expense was $140,526,000, with coal costing an average of $9.69 per ton. For the 12 months ended September 30, 1974, the annual fuel expense was $284,816,000—an increase of 103 percent. Current cost of coal is about $24 per ton.

Second. Another major item of expense is the interest Duke Power must pay on borrowed money. In 1970 interest expense was $51,422,000. For the 12 months ended September 30, 1974, $116,210,000—an increase of 126 percent.

Third. At the end of 1970, the depreciated original cost of Duke Power's electric plant in service was $1,618,297,000. As of September 30, 1974, electric plant in service was $3,028,510,000—up 87 percent.

This dramatic increase in plant to meet the company's customers' needs represents new investment of bondholders and preferred and common stockholders. In order to attract this large amount of their savings, the company simply must earn for them a reasonable return on their investment.

Fourth. Until 1970, the electric utility industry was a declining cost industry with each new addition to plant being installed at a cost per kilowatt—KW—less than the preceding one. Thus, in the early 1960's Duke Power was able to reduce electric rates six times. The increases which Duke Power's customers began to experience in 1970 were the company's first increases since 1952, according to Mr. Horn. The 1952 increase was a small one and the first general increase in the company's history.

Since 1970, each new addition to electric plant has cost more than the preceding one and this trend continues to accelerate with the rate of inflation and interest rates. In 1970 the construction cost of the company's newest steam electric generating unit, the coal-fired Marshall No. 4, was $97 per KW. In 1974 the company completed Belevs Creek No. 1 generating unit at $145 per KW—probably an industry record for economy of construction at this time, but still an increase of 49 percent over the newest coal-fired generating unit completed in 1970. Also in 1974 the company completed Oconee No. 2 nuclear unit at a cost of $191 per KW—again an industry record for economy of construction in 1974, but still a 97-percent increase over the newest unit installed in 1970. Nuclear units have higher capital costs than coal-fired units, but are considerably more economical to operate.

According to Mr. Horn, a number of Duke Power customers seem to think the company's rate increases are going to its stockholders in the form of dividends. He says this is not the case. In 1970 the annual dividend on Duke Power Co. common stock was $1.40 per share. In 1974 it is still $1.40 per share—no change.

Fifth. The fact that the company has been unable to increase its common stock dividend for 4 years has had an adverse effect on the market price of the company's stock. On December 31, 1970, the closing price of Duke Power common stock on the New York Stock Exchange was $24.75 per share, or 15.7 times 1970 earnings of $1.57 per share and 140 percent of 1970 book value per share of $17.64. On September 30, 1974, the stock closed at $10.50 per share, or 5½ times annual earnings of $1.89 per share, and only 51 percent of its book value of $20.41 per share.

Sixth. At the beginning of 1970 the credit rating on Duke Power Co.'s first mortgage bonds—the most economical source of long-term capital—was the very highest—AAA. Since then, it has declined to AA and then declined further to A.

The decline in market price in the common stock and credit ratings of the bonds has an adverse effect on the electric customer because it increases the company's financing costs. When the company has to sell additional stock at a price below its book value, it obviously has to sell more shares to raise the same amount of capital and costs the company more dollars at the same dividend rate. Decreasing the dividend rate would drive the market price down still further as graphically demonstrated by Consolidated Edison Co. of New York when it did so last April.

The annual interest rate demanded by purchasers of utility first mortgage bonds rated A is from 0.5 to 1½ percent more than the interest rate on AAA bonds, depending upon market conditions; 1½ percent of $100 million each year for 30 years amounts to $45 million more than the customers of an A utility may have to pay than the customers of an AAA company over that period. The importance to Duke Power's customers of a high bond rating is, therefore, quite apparent. A high bond rating only comes with satisfactory earnings by the company.

In 1970 the average Duke Power Co. residential customer used 9,864 kilowatt hours—kWh—at a cost to him of 1.73 cents per kWh. As of September 30, 1974, he used 10,656 kWh at a cost of 2.47 cents per kWh. This rate is well below the national average and is below the average for the 30 investor-owned electric utilities serving in the Southeast, where electric rates are generally well below the national average.

Every electric customer has two vital stakes in his electric service—one short-range and one long-range: The short-range stake is to have the lowest possible bill next month. The long-range stake is to have reliable electric service which will prevent brownouts, blackouts, and power interruptions—not just at home, but where he works and earns his livelihood. Many organized consumer groups consider only their short-range stake and completely ignore the long-range one, saying "It can't happen here."

But it can happen here. It has already begun to happen in some parts of our country where the electric utilities have been unable to attract new capital because they cannot raise their rates sufficiently to cover rising costs.

According to Mr. Horn, Duke Power Co. has done everything that it can to reduce expenses and capital expenditures. On August 19, 1974, the company announced a $1.3 billion reduction in its construction program and postponed construction at four generating plants, principally because it could not attract sufficient capital to pay for the plants on the original schedule. This action resulted in loss of jobs for 1,000 of Duke's employees. I understand the company has drastically reduced its maintenance expense, has ceased trading in its motor vehicles, discontinued operation of its employee training center, discontinued radio, TV, and newspaper advertising and reduced travel expense.

Any further cuts in Duke's plant construction program could seriously jeopardize the reliability of electric service in the Piedmont Carolinas to the extent of impairing not just its customers' comfort and convenience at home, but the reliability of their incomes from their jobs. So long as interest rates and the annual rate of inflation in the Nation's economy remain above 10 percent, reliable electric service can be provided only at increasingly higher costs.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure Duke Power Co. and other private utility companies do not like the present economic conditions any better than their customers do. Rate increases require thousands of man-hours of very hard work and cause increasing customer dissatisfaction and complaints. Unfortunately, however, the utility companies are no more immune to the averages of inflation than their customers are when they have to pay for the other necessities of life besides electricity. The public utility laws of North and South Carolina require power companies to furnish adequate and reliable electric service to all people in their service area who request it.

I believe most of those people still prefer adequate and reliable service even at higher prices to inadequate or unreliable service at a constant price. It really has become a matter of choice between these two alternatives.

NELSON ROCKEFELLER EMINENTLY QUALIFIED FOR VICE PRESIDENT

HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in unqualified endorsement of NELSON ROCKEFELLER for Vice President of the United States. His national and international positions of leadership and responsibility over a lifetime of service, as well as my own personal working experience with him, convince me that he is eminently qualified for this high national office.

My association with NELSON ROCKEFELLER goes back many years, almost to the birth of the Federal water pollution control program, when we were attempting to create a real, working partnership between the States and the Federal Government to clean up America's waters, and keep them clean.

New York, under Governor ROCKEFELLER, became the first State to join that partnership, when ROCKEFELLER personally led the effort to pass a billion-dollar State bond issue to finance pollution control in the most populous State.

In the ensuing years, as we attempted to improve on the basic groundwork of that law, and especially during the hard, gruelling work of hammering out the monumental Water Pollution Control Act Amendments of 1972, his counsel, his experience, and expertise were invaluable to the formulation and implementation of the national water pollution abatement program.

The National Commission on Water Quality was created by that 1972 act. Governor ROCKEFELLER was appointed to that Commission, along with Representatives and Senators from both sides of the political aisle; and he was unanimously elected its chairman.

The work of that Commission—projecting the impact of the sweeping 1972 legislation on every aspect of American life—bears the unmistakable impact of his distinguished leadership and commitment to a better environment.

His deep, personal commitment to the people of this country was nowhere better demonstrated than in his resignation from the governorship of New York, where he had served four terms, to head up the Commission on Critical Choices for America's Future which, under his guidance and broad vision, is probing every national issue, pulling together the diverse strands and strains of American life, to enable us to meet the challenges and opportunities of our third century.

ROCKEFELLER has proved himself a worker, a doer, an accomplisher; a man of broad experience, knowledge of domestic and international issues, and tremendous prestige here and abroad.

He is one of the finest leaders contemporary America has produced, and I am proud to cast my vote for NELSON ROCKEFELLER for Vice President of the United States.

TRIBUTES TO RETIRING PARLIAMENTARIAN AND SENATORS

HON. J. W. FULBRIGHT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 20, 1974

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I am delighted to be able to join Senators who today are honoring Dr. Floyd M. Riddick on the occasion of his retirement as Parliamentarian of the Senate. Through many turbulent years Dr. Riddick has handled with dexterity his most important task of keeping the proceedings on the Senate on track. He has, through endlessly long and late sessions, analyzed and interpreted the rules of the Senate with consummate skill, and moreover he has discharged this responsibility with fairness and with cordiality.

I must say that I would be remiss if I did not note the fact that in our 27-year association in the Senate neither I nor my staff has ever called on Dr. Riddick and received anything but prompt and sound advice. And for this I am particularly grateful to him.

Throughout my Senate career I have followed the activity of the Parliamentarian's office, for as some of my colleagues will recall, Dr. Riddick's predecessor was Charles Watkins, a fellow Arkansan and the Senate's first Parliamentarian. When his time came Floyd Riddick certainly handled the challenge and I commend him for continuing in the same high distinction which has been characteristic of the office of Parliamentarian of the Senate.

The Senate is fortunate that Dr. Riddick has chosen to continue to serve the Senate in a consulting capacity, and I wish him well in his new and different responsibilities.

To his successor, Murray Zweben, who also has been most helpful to me over the year, I offer my thanks and my very best wishes for his future.

SENATOR ERVIN

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I am honored to be able to join Senators in bidding farewell to SAM ERVIN on the occasion of his retirement from the Senate. Since his first election to the Senate in 1954 he has been the constitutional conscience of this Chamber and he leaves a legacy which, if nurtured, will be of immense value to succeeding Congresses.

SAM ERVIN's strength, in addition to his eminent scholarship of the Constitution, has been his unerring sense of constitutional perspective—his understanding of how and where this document should protect and relate to the American people in their daily lives. In an era which had seen Congress abdicate its proper responsibilities under the Constitution to the executive branch, the arrival of SAM ERVIN in Washington could not have been more timely. He reminded us of the role that we in Congress must fill for our system to be viable and of the danger which would result from the unchecked abuse of executive power—particularly in the areas of impoundment and executive privilege. SAM ERVIN has been instrumental in reversing our course to one of more constitutional balance, and we are all in his debt for the lesson he has taught us.

His courage was evident from his very first year in the Senate when he stood firmly against a powerful man who was using high office to plunder the spirit of our Bill of Rights. SAM ERVIN has shown the courage of those convictions consistently since that time.

It was during the widely followed Watergate hearings in 1973 that the entire country was allowed to focus on the Ervin wisdom through the medium of television. For our people this was a fortunate occurrence because it allowed them to become familiar with the sound logic with which SAM ERVIN has been persuading his colleagues for many years.

Judge ERVIN has been philosophically consistent in opposing the intrusion of Government where it is not necessary to better the lives of our people.

To SAM ERVIN, a fond farewell, and best wishes for the future.

SENATOR BIBLE

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, ALAN BIBLE's decision to retire from the Senate will deprive this institution of one of its hardest working and most respected members. His diligence and his integrity have caused him to command the highest regard of every Member of the Senate, and I must say that his seriousness of purpose will be sorely missed when he leaves this Chamber.

The people of this country owe gratitude to ALAN BIBLE for many things, but there are a couple of areas of his endeavors which have been particularly beneficial to my constituents. So I believe I can speak for the citizens of Arkansas in giving a special thanks to ALAN BIBLE for his attentive consideration of the needs of my State. I refer specifically to his sympathetic handling of our requests before his Appropriations Subcommittee on Interior Matters. Chairman BIBLE could always be counted on to listen patiently and respond generously toward the solutions of our problems. Moreover, as chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Small Business, he has done much to alleviate the burden of the small businessman in Arkansas, and indeed in the entire country.

The Senator from Nevada has worked tirelessly to improve our national park system and perhaps this will be the legacy for which he will be most remembered.

Mr. President, the University of Nevada will be enriched by ALAN BIBLE's decision to serve on its faculty, and as a former academician myself I believe that I can assure him that this task will be gratifying. Mrs. Fulbright and I wish the Bibles a very happy future.

SENATOR HUGHES

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I am privileged to be able to join Senators today to honor HAROLD HUGHES on the occasion of his retirement from the Senate. I believe the word courageous most aptly describes this man. In his service in the Senate, HAROLD HUGHES has taken no easy roads. He has met the larger and more controversial issues and confronted them squarely. In so doing he has earned a special affection and respect which will be long remembered by the people who have benefited from his courage.

The Senator from Iowa saw the folly of the policies which our Government pursued in Southeast Asia, and I as one who shared his conviction on this question must say that I found the character and conviction of HAROLD HUGHES a source of strength to me.

He will also be remembered for his untiring efforts to improve the lot of the downtrodden and disadvantaged; and in this area his contributions were significant. Mrs. Fulbright and I offer our fondest wishes to the Hughes family.

SENATOR BENNETT

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, when the 93d Congress adjourns the Senate will lose one of its most conscientious and honest men—WALLACE F. BENNETT, of Utah.

WALLACE BENNETT was first elected to the Senate in 1950 and since that time I have had many occasions to be witness to his industry and his integrity. We have served together on the Banking Committee as well as the Finance Committee and the Senator from Utah was certainly a healthy influence on both. I can recall several areas where WALLACE BENNETT has left a contribution to our people. Improving our health delivery system has always been of special concern to him and he is perhaps more than anyone else, responsible for the PSRO legislation which is helping assure our citizens of improved health care at more reasonable costs.

His mastery of our tax system was another of WALLACE BENNETT's accomplishments, and this enabled him greatly to contribute to the work of the Finance Committee, where his resourcefulness will be missed.

Given his impeccable character the Senator from Utah was a perfect choice for service on the Senate Ethics Committee, and the Senate will be challenged to find one of his integrity to replace him on that panel.

Mrs. Fulbright joins me in wishing WALLACE BENNETT and his family a very happy future.

SENATOR COTTON

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I am pleased to be able to join Senators in paying tribute to NORRIS COTTON on the occasion of his retirement from the Senate. My colleague from New Hampshire this month will complete a distinguished career in both Houses of Congress spanning nearly 30 years. The trust of his people was well placed for he has served his constituents faithfully and well. He was a champion of fiscal conservatism and perhaps in reflecting on these times of economic uncertainty it would have been perhaps the wiser course for the Senate to have given greater heed to the Senator's continued call for more fiscal responsibility.

To be sure, NORRIS COTTON and I have disagreed on many major issues, but I believe that our differences were honest and were in the highest spirit of the forum where they occurred. In contrast with our differences we had as a common bond the fact that we both represented small States and I must say that I have always admired the manner in which NORRIS COTTON attentively looked after the special problems of the people who sent him to Washington.

So, Mr. President, I offer to the Senator from New Hampshire my good will and many good wishes for much happiness in the days ahead.
